Francis, a village of St. Genevieve Co. Missouri. Francis, St., a tributary stream of the great river Mississippi, rising in the state of Missouri, in the lat. of 37. 45. N., running parallel with the Mississippi on the W., at the distance of about 40 m. and enters it after a course of about 220 m., 45 m. above the entrance of the Arkansas.

Francis, St., a river of Lower Canada, rising in the lake Memphramagog, which spreads into the state of Vermont. The St. Francis, after a course of about 200 m. falls into St. Lawrence, about midway between Montreal and Quebec, and will probably some future day, be united by a canal with the Connecticut.

Francis, St., a river of Brazil, which rises W. of the Brazilian Andes, in the province of Minas Geraes, in the lat. of 20. S., runs N. through the province of Bahia, to the frontier of Pernambuco, when it takes a course E. by S., dividing that province from Bahia, and after a course of near 1,000 m. falls into the Atlantic ocean, in the lat. of 11. 20. S. It has a number of towns and settlements, chiefly on its head waters.

Francisco, St., a seaport of New Albion, capital of a jurisdiction of its name, with a citadel. Long. 122. 8. W., lat. 23. 18. N.

"There are a number of other rivers, bays, towns, and settlements, in different parts of America, named after St. Francis by the Spaniards, Portuguese, and French.

François, a village of Wayne Co. Missouri.

François, Cape, now called Cape Haytien, the principal seaport and city of what was formerly the French part of St. Domingo. It is seated on the N. coast of the island, in the lat. of 19. 46. N. and 72. 15. of W. long. Before the sanguinary revolt of the negroes in 1793, it contained 8 to 900 houses of stone or brick, and 8,000 free inhabitants, exclusive of about 12,000 slaves; but in 1793, the whole of the white inhabitants, who could not effect their escape, were massacred by the blacks. It was named Cape Henry by Christophe in 1811, and during his reign it was deemed the principal port of the island, though inferior to Port au Prince in commercial importance. Its quota of the contribution towards the 30 millions of dollars be paid to France in ten years, from the 1st of January, 1827, as an indemnity for the sacrifice of their plantations by the revolt in 1793, is 208,451 dollars annually. It is 84 m. due N. of Port au Prince, and 134 W., 30 degrees N. of the city of St. Domingo. The harbour is secure and commodious, and the environs rich in tropical productions.

Franconia, one of the ten circles into which the German Empire was formerly divided, lying between the lat. of 48. 45. and 50. 55. N. It is bounded on the N. by Upper Saxony, E. by Bohemia and the palatinate of Bavaria, S. by Suabia, and W. by the circles of the Rhine. The middle is fertile in corn, wine, and fruits; but the borders are full of woods and barren mountains. The Franks, who conquered France, in the early part of the 16th century, came from this province, and gave their name to that country. It comprises about 11,000 sq. m. and was formerly divided into 2 principalities, 3 bishoprics, 7 counties, and 3 lordships; but at the general partitioning of this part of Europe, after the peace of Paris in 1814, the greater part of Franconia was assigned to Bavaria, and the remainder to Wurtemberg, Baden, Hesse, and Saxe Coburg. The river Mayn, which falls into the Rhine, intersects it from E. to W., the Rednitz from S. to N., falling into the Mayne, and the Altmuhl, falling into the Danube, intersects the S. E. Nuremberg was considered the capital.

Franeker, a town of Holland, in Friesland, with a castle and a university. The public buildings and palaces are magnificent, and it has 2 navigable canals, communicating with the Zuyder Zee and Leeward, it is 5 m. E. of Harlingen. Pop. about 4,000.

Frankfort on the Maine, a fortified city of Germany, in the circle of the Rhine. It is divided by the river Maine, 25 m. above its entrance into the Rhine, into two parts, which communicate by means of a stone bridge; the larger part, on the N. side is called Frankfort, and the smaller Sachsenhausen. It contains several palaces and courts belonging to princes and counts; and here the kings of the Romans have generally been elected and crowned. The chief structure is the town-house, in which is preserved the golden bull, the origin of the fundamental laws of the empire. All religions are tolerated at Frankfort, under certain restrictions; but Lutheranism is the established faith; though the principal church is in the possession of the Roman Catholics. The Jews, 8 to 9,000 in number, were formerly confined to a particular corner of the city; but since 1796, they have resided indiscriminately in all parts. Frankfort is one of the most considerable trading places in Europe, and has two great fairs every year. It was taken in 1759, by the French, who evacuated it in 1763. It was several times taken and retaken by the French and Austrians, in the war of 1793-1814. Since the peace of the latter year, it has been declared the permanent seat of the Germanic diet; and as such most of the European states have a minister resident here. It was the birth place of Goethe; and also of the family of the Rothschilds, who, during the war between 1807 and 1815 and ten years subsequent thereto, became the greatest money jobbers in Europe. Frankfort is in lat. 50. 7. N. and 8. 32. of E. long. Pop. about 40,000.

Frankfort on the Oder, a town of Brandenburg, in the Middle Mark, with a famous university and a noble academy. It has three great fairs, and the exclusive right of navigation up the Oder to Breslau. Here are two suburbs called Lebus and Guben, and a bridge over the Oder. In 1759, it was taken by the Russians and Austrians, and in 1806, it fell into the hands of the French; but fell to Prussia on the retreat of the French army from Moscow in 1812. It is 45 m. E. by S. of Berlin, and 72 S. of Stettin. Pop. about 12,000.

Frankfort, the chief town of Franklin county, Kentucky, and seat of the legislative assembly of the state. It is regularly laid out, and stands on the E. bank of the Kentucky, 60 m. from its conflux with the Ohio, and 415 m. W. by S. of Washington. Pop. 1,987.

Friendly Islands, a group of islands in the South Pacific ocean, so named by Cook, in 1773, on account of the friendship that appeared to subsist among the inhabitants, and their courteous behaviour to strangers. Tasman, a Dutch navigator, first touched here in 1653, and gave the name of New Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and Middleburg, to three of the principal islands. Cook explored the whole cluster, which he found to consist of more than 20 islands, the principal of which are Tongataboo, or Amsterdam; Eaooove or Middleburg; Annamooka, or Rotterdam; Ha-paece, and Lefooga. The first, which is the largest, lies in 174. 46. W. long., and 21. 9. S. lat.

The general appearance of these islands, conveys an idea of the most exuberant fertility the surface at a distance, seems entirely clothed with trees of various sizes, some of which are very large, particularly the tall cocoa, palm, and species of fig with narrow-pointed leaves. On closer examination, they are almost wholly laid out in plantations, in which are some of the richest productions of nature; such as bread-fruit and cocoa-nut trees, plantains, yams, sugar-canes, and a fruit like a nectarine. The stock of quadrupeds are scanty; but they received from Cook some valuable additions, both to the animal and vegetable kingdom. Their domestic fowls are as large as those of Europe. Among the birds are parrots and paroquets of various sorts which furnish the red feathers so much esteemed in the Society isles. The numerous reefs and shoals afford shelter for an endless variety of shell-fish. These islands are all inhabited by a race of people, who cultivate the earth with great industry. Nature, assisted by a little art, appears no where in greater splendour. Agriculture, architecture, boat-building and fishing, are the employments of the men: and to the women is confined the manufacture of cloth.

Galapagos, a cluster of islands, in the Pacific Ocean, near the coast of Colombia. They lie under the equator, and the centre island is in long. 85. 30. W. They are uninhabited, but are frequently visited by the South Sea whale ships for fresh water and provisions. The largest is 60 or 70 m. long and 50 broad.

They are in general barren; but some of the highest have a stunted brushwood, and all of them are covered with the prickly pear-tree, upon which a large species of land-tortoise lives and thrives in a wonderful manner. The most accurate and full account of these curious animals is contained in a very amusing book, Delano's Voyages and Travels, printed at Boston, in 1817. Captain Delano says,—“The Terrapin, or as it is sometimes called, the Land-Tortoise, that is found at the Galapagos Islands, is by far the largest, best, and most numerous, of any place I ever visited. Some of the largest weigh three or four hundred pounds; but their common size is between fifty and one hundred pounds. Their shape is somewhat similar to that of our small land-tortoise, which is found upon the upland, and is like it, high and round on the back. They have a very long neck, which, together with their head, has a disagreeable appearance, very much resembling a large serpent. I have seen them with necks between two and three feet long, and when they saw anything that was new to them, or met each other, they would raise their heads as high as they could, their necks being nearly vertical, and advance with their mouths wide open, appearing to be the most spiteful of any reptile whatever. Sometimes two of them would come up to each other in that manner, so near as almost to touch, and stand in that position for two or three minutes, appearing so angry, that their mouths, heads, and necks appeared to quiver with passion, when, by the least touch of a stick against their necks or heads, they would shrink back in an instant, and draw their necks, heads, and legs into their shells. This is the only quick motion I ever saw them perform. I was put in the same kind of fear that is felt at the sight or near approach of a snake, at the first one I saw, which was very large. I was alone at the time, and he stretched himself as high as he could, opened his mouth, and advanced towards me. His body was raised more than a foot from the ground, his head turned forward in the manner of a snake in the act of biting, and raised two feet and a half above its body. I had a musket in my hand at the time, and when he advanced near enough to reach him with it, I held the muzzle out so that he hit his neck against it, at the touch of which he dropt himself upon the ground, and instantly secured all his limbs within his shell. They are perfectly harmless, as much so as any animal I know of, notwithstanding their threatening appearance. They have no teeth, and of course they cannot bite very hard. They take their food into their mouths by the assistance of the sharp edge of the upper and under jaw, which shut together, one a little within the other, so as to nip grass, or any flowers, berries, or shrubbery, the only food they eat. Those who have seen the elephant, have seen the exact resemblance of the leg and foot of a terrapin. I have thought that I could discover some faint resemblance to that animal in sagacity. They are very prudent in taking care of themselves and their eggs, and in the manner of securing them in their nests; and I have observed on board my own ship, as well as others, that they can easily be taught to go to any place on the deck, which may be wished for them to be constantly kept in. The method to effect this is, by whipping them with a small line when they are out of place, and to take them up and carry them to the place assigned for them; which, being repeated a few times, will bring them into the practice of going themselves, by being whipped when they are out of their place. They can be taught to eat on board a ship, as well as a sheep, or a goat; and will live for a long time, if there is proper food provided for them. This I always took care to do, when in a place where I could procure it. The most suitable to take on board a ship, is prickly pear-trees; the trunk of which is a soft, pithy substance, of a sweetish taste, and full of juice. Sometimes I procured grass for them. Either of these being strewed on the quarter-deck, the pear-tree being cut fine, would immediately entice them to come from all parts of the deck to it; and they would eat in their way, as well as any domestic animal. I have known them live several months without food; but they always, in that case, grow lighter, and their fat diminishes, as common sense teaches, notwithstanding some writers have asserted to the contrary. Their flesh, without exception, is of as sweet and pleasant a flavour as any that I ever eat. It was common to take out of one of them, ten or twelve pounds of fat, when they were opened, besides what was necessary to cook them with. This was as yellow as our best butter, and of a sweeter flavour than hog's lard. They are the slowest in their motions of any animal I ever saw, except the sloth. They are remarkable for their strength; one of them would bear a man's weight on his back and walk with him. I have seen them at one or two other places only. One instance was, those brought from Madagascar to the Isle of France; but they were far inferior in size, had longer legs, and were much more ugly in their looks, than those of the Galapagos Islands.

Galashiels, a town of Scotland, in Selkirkshire with a manufacture of woollen cloth, known by the name of Galashiels Gray. It is seated on the Gala, near its conflux with the Tweed, 5 m. N. of Selkirk.

Galbally, a village of Ireland, in the county of Limerick, 23 m. S. E. of Limerick. Pop 412.

Galicia, a late province in the S. W. part of Poland, lying between the lat. 48. and 51. N. and 19. and 26. of E. long. It is bounded on the S. in a direction W. by N. by the Carpathian mountains, which divides it from Hungary; the W. end jets upon Silesia, the Vistula river forms part of its northern, and the Bug part of its eastern boundary; the S. E. extremity is divided by the Bukowine district from Moldavia, and the Dneister river intersects the S. E. part. This territory was forcibly seized by the Austrians in 1772, and incorporated into the Austrian dominions, under the appellation of the kingdom of Galicia and Lodomeria. The mountainous parts possess fine pasture; the plains are mostly sandy, but abound in forests, and are fertile in corn. The principal articles of traffic are cattle, hides, wax, and honey; the country also contains mines of copper, lead, iron, and salt, of which the latter are the most valuable. Its limits comprise upward of 32,900 sq. m., the pop. about 3,750,000. It is divided into East Galicia and West Galicia, of which the capitals are Lemberg and Cracoy.

Galicia, a province of Spain, forming the N. W. extremity of the Peninsula, bounded on the N. and W. by the Atlantic Ocean, on the E. by Asturias and Leon, on the S. by the Portuguese province of Tras-os-Montes, and on the S. W. by the river Minho, which divides it from the Portuguese province of Entre Douro e Minho. Its extreme length from the mouth of the Minho river in 41. 52., to Cape Ortegal, the extreme northern limit of Spain in 42. 46. N., is 133 statute m., and its extreme width from the frontier of Leon to Cape Finisterre, the extreme western limit of Spain in the lat. of 42. 56. N., and 9. 17. of W. long. is about 120 m.; but the mean length and breadth does not much, if at all, exceed 100 m.: its area therefore comprises about 10,000 sq. m.; the pop. in 1810 amounted to 1,142,630. It is one of the most mountainous districts in Spain, yielding abundance of fine timber, and various minerals. The whole extent of its coast is indented with fine bays and harbours. Ferrol, 25 m. S. S. W. of Cape Ortegal, is one of the principal stations of the Spanish national marine.

the port of Corunna is on the S. W. side of the same bay, in which the harbour of Ferrol is situated: the most important harbour on the W. coast is Vigo bay, about 50 m. S. of Cape Finisterre, and a few m. N. of the mouth of the Minho. Santiago, or St. Jago de Compostella, 35 m. S. of Corunna, and 300 N. W. of Madrid, is the capital of the province; the other principal towns are Mondoneda and Betanzas in the N. E., Lugo 35 m. E. of Santiago, Orense on the S., and Ciudad Tuy on the N. bank of the Minho, and Bayona on a southern inlet of Vigo bay.

Galitsch, a town of Russia, in the government of Kostroma, on the S. side of a lake of its name, 56 m. E. N. E. of Kostroma. Long. 42. 54. E., lat. 57. 56. N.

Gallia, a county on the S. E. border of the state of Ohio, bounded by the Ohio river, where it receives the great Kanawha from Virginia. Pop. 9,733. Gallipolis, on the Ohio is the chief town.

Galle, or Point de Galle, a sea-port on the S. coast of Ceylon, in a rich and beautiful district, with a strong fort and a secure harbour. It is populous, and in point of trade ranks next to Colombo. The chief branch of its traffic consists in the exportation of fish to the continent; but a great part of the products of the island are also shipped here for Europe. It is 85 m. S. by E. of Colombo. Long. 80. 10. E., lat. 6. 0. N.

Gallipoli, a strait between European and Asiatic Turkey, the ancient Hellespont. It forms the communication between the Archipelago and the sea of Marmora, and is defended at the S. W. entrance by two castles. It is here 2 m. over, and is 33 m. long. See Dardanelles.

Gallipoli, a town of European Turkey, which gives name to the preceding strait, is seated near its opening into the sea of Marmora. It is the residence of a pacha, and the see of a Greek bishop. It contains about 10,000 Turks, 3,500 Greeks, beside a great number of Jews. It is an open place, with no other defence than a sorry square castle. It was the first place in Europe possessed by the Turks; 100 m. S. W. of Constantinople. Long. 26. 59. E., lat. 40. 26. N.

Gallipoli, a sea-port of Naples, in Terra di Otranto, and a bishop's see. This place is a great mart for olive oil, and has a manufacture of muslins. It is seated on a rocky island, on the E. shore of the bay of Tarento, and joined to the main land by a bridge, protected by a fort, 23 m. W. of Otranto. Long. 18. 5. E., lat. 40. 20. N. Pop. about 9,000.

Gallipolis, p.v. Gallia Co. Ohio, on the Ohio river.

Galloway, a district of Scotland, now divided into East and West Galloway, or Kirkcudbright shire, and Wigtownshire. It was famous for a particular breed of small horses, called galloways.

Galloway, Mull of, the extreme S. W. point of Scotland, in the lat. of 59. 33. N., and 4. 50. of W. long. It forms the W. point of entrance to Luce bay, and the E. point of entrance to the North Channel, between the Irish Sea, and the Atlantic Ocean.

Galway, a maritime county, in the province of Connaught, on the W. coast of Ireland, being about 100 m. in extreme length from E. to W. the W. part projecting into the Atlantic Ocean, is a mountainous and dreary district, but the inland part is in general fertile both in grain and pasture; next to Cork it is the largest county in Ireland, comprising 989,950 acres, and in 1821 contained a pop. of 337,374. It is bounded on the E. by the river Suck, which divides it from Roscommon, and the Shannon on the S. E. divides it from Tipperary, lake Corrib divides the W. from the E. part of the county; beside the county town of the same name, the other principal towns are Tuam, Athenry, and Loughrea.

Galway, the chief town of the preceding county, is seated on the banks, of the outlet of lake Corrib into Galway bay, 126 m. due W. of Dublin. It was formerly surrounded by strong walls; the streets are large and straight, and the houses are generally well built of stone. The harbour is defended by a fort. Here is a coarse woollen and linen manufacture, and a considerable trade in kelp. The salmon and herring fishery is also considerable. It is divided into 3 parishes, and is a county of itself, having a separate jurisdiction. The principal church, which its collegiate, is a spacious gothic edifice; it has several catholic establishments of friars and nuns, a county infirmary, exchange, and several other public buildings. Pop. in 1820, 27,775.

Gangapatnam, a town of Hindoostan, in the Carnatic, at the mouth of the Pannar, 94 m. N. of Madras. Long. 80. 12. E., lat. 14. 24. N.

Gangea, or Ganja, a town of Persia, in the province of Eviran, 105 m. S. by E. of Teflis. Long. 45. 50. E., lat. 41. 10. N.

Ganges, a celebrated river of Asia, which has its source in two springs, on the W. side of Mt. Kentaiffe, in Tibet, in the lat. of 34. N., and 82. of E. long. The 2 streams take a W. direction for 300 m. when meeting the ridge of Himmaleh, they turn S., unite their waters, and form what is properly called the Ganges, from the Hindoo word Ganga, which signifies a river; a term given it by way of eminence. This great body of water now forces a passage through the ridge of Himmaleh at the distance of 400 m. below the place of its first approach, and rushing through a cavern, precipitates itself into a vast basin, at the hither foot of the mountain. The Ganges thus appears, to incurious spectators, to have its source from this chain of mountains. Superstition has given to the mouth of the cavern the form of the head of a cow; an animal held by the Hindoos in great veneration; and it is therefore called the Gangotri, or the Cow's Mouth. From this place it takes a S. E. direction through the country of Sirinagur, until, at Hurdwar, it finally escapes from this mountainous tract in which it has wandered 800 m. From Hurdwar, where it gushes through an opening in the mountains, and enters Hindoostan, it flows 1,200 m. with a smooth navigable stream, through delightful plains, to the bay of Bengal, which it enters by several mouths, that form an extensive delta, in the lat. of 22. N., and between 88. and 91. of E. long. In its course through these plains, it receives 11 rivers, some of them larger and none smaller than the Thames, besides many of inferior note; the principal of which are the Gogra, Cossy, and the Burampooter from the N., and the Jumna, Soane, and Dummooda from the S. In the annual inundation of this river, which on an average rises 31 feet, the country is overflowed to the extent of more than 100 m. in width. The Ganges is, in every respect, one of the most beneficial rivers in the world; diffusing plenty immediately by means of its living productions; and by enriching the lands, affording an easy conveyance for the production of its borders, and giving employment to many thousand boatmen. It is no wonder, therefore, that the Hindoos regard this river as a kind of deity, that they hold its waters in high veneration, and that it is visited annually by a prodigious number of pilgrims from all parts of Hindoostan. See Hoogly.

Gangotri, a town of the country of Sirinagur, seated on the Ganges, where that river rushes through a cavern of the Himmaleh mountains, 170 m. N. N. W. of Sirinagur. Long. 76. 35. E., lat. 38. 8. N.

Gangpou, a town of Hindoostan, in Orissa, capital of a circar of its name. It is 50 m. N. N. E. of Sumbulpour, and 160 N. W. of Cuttack. Long. 84. 10. E., lat. 22. 2. N.

Ganjam, a town of Hindoostan, in the circar of Cicaole, on the bay of Bengal, at the mouth of a river which is rarely navigable, near the S. end of lake Chilca, 110 m. N. E. of Cicaole. Long. 85. 20. E., lat. 19. 22. N.

Geneva, a fortified city, capital of a territory of the same name, surrounded by the duchy of Savoy, of which it was formerly a part, and the see of a bishop, now resident at Annecy. In 1584, Geneva concluded an alliance with Zurich and Bern, by which it was an associate with Switzerland. During the greater part of the 18th century, there were frequent contests between the aristocratic and the popular parties; and the years 1768, 1782, 1789, and 1794, were distinguished by great revolutions. The last was effected entirely by the influence of the French; and not long after, this city and its territory was made a department of France, under the name of Leman; but in 1814, after the expulsion of the French, it was annexed to Switzerland. Geneva, which stands partly on a plain at the W. end of a lake, and partly on a gentle ascent, is irregularly built. It has a good arsenal, and an university founded in 1368. The houses are lofty; and many in the trading part of the city have arcades of wood, which are raised even to the upper stories. The inhabitants, estimated at 26,000, carry on a great trade, and among others the watch-making business is particularly flourishing. The pop. of the district in 1825, was 41,560. Geneva is 40 m. N. E. of Chambery, 135 N. W. of Turin, and 256 S. E. by S. of Paris. Long. 6. 0. E., lat. 46. 12. N.

Geneva, Lake of, a large expanse of water, between Savoy and Switzerland, in a valley which separates the Alps from Mount Jura. Its length from the city of Geneva to Villeneuve, is 54 m., and the breadth in the widest part is 12. The water near Geneva is shallow; in other parts the depth is various; the greatest, yet found by sounding, is 160 fathoms. The river Rhone runs through it from the E. to the W. extremity.

Geneva, a duchy of Savoy, comprising an area of about 600 square m. bounded on the N. W. by the Rhone.

Geneva, a village in the township of Seneca, Ontario Co. N. Y. It stands on Seneca lake and is one of the neatest villages in the State. The neighborhood has a varied and pleasant scenery with many elegant country seats. The village contains 4 churches, a bank and a college. The college was founded in 1823. It has 6 instructors and a library of 1,500 volumes. It has 3 vacations of 10 weeks. Commencement is in August.

Genes is also the name of a township in Ash-tabula Co. Ohio, and of a village in Jennings Co. Indiana.

Genevieve, St. a county in the state of Missouri, on the W. bank of the Mississippi river, comprising about 1,100 sq. m. of territory. Pop. 2,182. The St. Francis river intersects the S. W. part of the county, which contains an exceedingly rich bed of lead ore.

Genzenbach, a town of Suabia, in Brisgau, with a Benedictine abbey; seated on a rivulet of the same name, which flows into the Kintzig, 20 m. N. of Friburg.

Genoa, a celebrated city and sea-port of Italy, distinguished for its trading importance as far back as the 11th century, about which period it began to take under its protection the towns and territory of the adjoining coast; but the most celebrated period of its history is from the close of the 13th to the middle of the 15th century, when the Genoese divided with the Venetians the exclusive commerce of Europe in the productions of Asia. Their success however in commerce and banking excited the jealousy of the Venetians, and ultimately involved them in open hostilities, and in 1746 it surrendered to the Austrian power, whose oppression of the inhabitants was such, that the latter suddenly rose and expelled their conquerors, who again besieged the city the next year, but without effect. In 1798, the French became masters of this city. In 1800, it sustained a siege by a British fleet and Austrian army till literally starved, and was evacuated by capitulation; but soon afterwards it was again delivered up to the French, on their victory at Marengo. Early in 1814, it was taken by the British, under lord Bentinck, but at the general partitioning of Europe which followed the peace of Paris, in that year, the city and territory of Genoa was assigned to the king of Sardinia, and incorporated as a state into his dominions. The harbour is commodious, protected by two moles of considerable length; the city is about 6 m. in circumference, surrounded on all sides by a strong wall, and on the land side is defended by a double fortification; most of the streets are narrow and irregular, but the Balbi, New Street, and Strada Nuovissima, are spacious and elegant. Prior to the French revolution it had upwards of 30 churches and 70 religious houses, three theatres, and several other public buildings. Many of the houses in the principal streets are adorned with marble porticos, and several of the churches are beautiful specimens of architecture, and their interior decorations exceedingly tasteful and rich. The bank of Genoa, established in 1345, considerably extended at the commencement of the following century, in 1751 became insolvent for a large amount, and in 1798 was finally abolished by Bonaparte. Although Genoa now holds an inferior rank, yet from its advantageous local position and maritime accommodation as the outport and depot for the whole of Piedmont and Sardinia, it must necessarily continue a place of considerable importance. Genoa is the see of an archbishop, and the seat of an university with a valuable library; a nautical and other public schools; has several manufactures of silk and jewellery, and is particularly distinguished for its manufacture of silk velvets. It is seated at the head of a spacious gulf of the Mediterranean, in the lat. of 44. 25. N., and 8. 59. of E. long., 80 m. in a meridional line S. E. of Turin, about the same distance S. by W. of Milan, 86 N. W. of Leghorn, 95 N. E. of Nice. Pop. 76,000. The territory which formed the republic of Genoa extends along the shore of the gulf for about 120 m.

George, Fort, a fortress of Scotland, in Invernesshire, which has several handsome streets of barracks. It is seated on the point of a peninsula, forming the point of entrance into the Murray Frith, and completely commands the entrance into the harbour of Inverness. It is 10 m. N. E. of Inverness.

George, St. a small island in the Gulf of Venice, to the S. of Venice, to which it is subject. Here is a Benedictine monastery, whose church is one of the finest in Italy.

George, St. one of the Azores, which produces much wheat. In 1808 a volcano broke out here, which destroyed the town of Ursulina, several farming-houses, &c. The chief town is Vellas. Long. 28. 0. W., lat. 38. 39. N.

George del Mina, St. a fort of Guinea, on the Gold Coast, and the principal settlement of the Dutch in those parts. The town under it, called by the natives Oddenna, is very long, and pretty broad. The houses are built of stone, which is uncommon, for in other places they are composed only of clay and wood. It is 10 m. W. S. W. of Cape Coast Castle. Long. 0. 4. W., lat. 8. 46. N.

George, Fort, St. See Madras.

George, St. the largest of the Bermuda Islands. It is in the form of a hook, about 40 m. in length, but seldom 2 in breadth. It has a town of the same name, containing 500 houses built of freestone, which is the capital of all the islands. Long. 63. 35. W., lat. 32. 45. N.

George, St. the capital of the island of Grenada, formerly called Fort-Royal, which name the fort still retains. It is situate on the W. coast, not far from the S. end of the island, and has a safe and commodious harbour. Long. 61. 45. W., lat. 11. 50. N.

George's Key, St. a small island in the bay of Honduras, on the E. coast of Yucatan. It is likewise called Cassina, or Cayo Cassigo. By a convention in 1786, the English logwood-cutters were permitted, under certain restrictions, to occupy this island. Long. 88. 35. W., lat. 17. 40. N.

George, Lake, in the eastern part of the state of New York, between Lake Champlain and the Hudson. It is 34 m. long, but very narrow, never exceeding 4 m. Its waters pass by a narrow outlet into Lake Champlain. This is one of the most beautiful sheets of water in the world, being surrounded by mountains and diversified with a great number of islands. The water is deep and remarkably pure and transparent. A fish or a stone may be seen at a depth of 30 feet. The shores consist of abrupt and shelving points, and are bounded by two long ranges of mountains, sometimes rising boldly from the water and at others ascending with a gentle and graceful sweep, exhibiting naked and weather beaten cliffs, and wild forests intermixed with fine cultivated fields, lawns, and pastures. The village of Caldwell stands on the south-eastern side of the lake, and is much visited by travellers who come to enjoy the fine scenery in the neighbourhood. A steamboat plies upon the lake in summer.

The islands of the lake are said to be 365 in number. They are of all sizes and forms, and contribute greatly to the romantic beauty of its surface. Some of them are covered with trees, others are thinly wooded, and others are abrupt and craggy rocks. Diamond Island, abounds in crystals of quartz. Long Island contains 100 acres and is under cultivation. At a place called the Narrows, the lake is contracted, and its surface is covered with a most beautiful cluster of islands which extends for several miles.

These are of various sizes, but generally very small, and of little elevation. A few of them are named, as Green, Bass, Lone-tree islands. Some of them are covered with trees, others with shrubs, some show little lawns or spots of grass, heaps of barren rocks, or gently sloping shores; and most of them are ornamented with graceful pines, hemlocks, and other tall trees, collected in groups, or standing alone, and disposed with most charming variety. Sometimes an island will be observed just large enough to support a few fine trees, or perhaps a single one, while the next may appear like a solid mass of bushes and wild flowers; near at hand, perhaps, is a third, with a dark grove of pines, and a decaying old trunk in front of it; and thus, through every interval between the islands as you pass along, another and another labyrinth is opened to view, among little isolated spots of ground, divided by narrow channels, from which it seems impossible for a person who should have entered them, ever to find his way out. Some of the islands look almost like ships with their masts; and many have an air of lightness as if they were sailing upon the lake.

After passing the Narrows, the lake widens again, and the retrospect is, for several miles, through that passage, with Tongue Mountain on the west, and Black Mountain opposite, the Luzerne range appearing at a great distance between them. The mountains in view have generally rounded summits; but the sides are in many places broken by precipitous ledges. They are inhabited by wolves, deer, rattlesnakes, &c.

The lake contains abundance of the finest perch, bass and other fish; trout are found in a stream flowing into the southern part. Near the southern shore are the ruins of Fort William Henry and Fort George, celebrated in the early wars with the French.

George, St. an island of the United States, in the strait of St. Mary which forms the communication between Lake Superior and Lake Huron.

George, St. an island in the gulf of Mexico, opposite the mouth of the Apalachicola. Long. 84. 50. W., lat. 29. 30. N.

Georgetown, p.v. Franklin Co. Ohio.

Georgetown, a maritime district of South Carolina, bounded on the S. by the Santee river, which divides it from Charleston district; it has 34 m. of sea-coast, indented with several small inlets. Black River, Cedar and Lynches Creeks, the great and little Pedee, and the Waccamaw river, all unite their waters in this district, which comprises a surface of about 900 square miles, exceedingly fertile in rice and cotton. Pop. 19,943.

Georgetown, a city of the District of Columbia adjoining Washington, from which it is separated by a small creek. It stands on the east bank of the Potomac at the head of tide water. The site of the town is very pleasant, occupying a succession of hills rising gradually from the river. On a height overlooking the town stands a catholic monastery. The streets of the town are regular and the houses generally of brick. It has a considerable trade in the exportation of tobacco and flour. Pop. 8,441. A canal from the Potomac to the Ohio begins at this place. See Potomac and Ohio Canal.

Georgetown, p.t. the chief town of the district of that name in S. Carolina, stands on Winyaw Bay near the mouth of the Pedee, 13 m. from the sea; and has considerable commerce.

Georgetown is also the name of 9 other towns and villages in different parts of the United States; namely, Lincoln Co. Me. Pop. 1,258. Madison Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,094. Mercer Co. Pa., Beaver Co. Pa., Sussex Co. Delaware, Kent Co. Maryland, Warren Co. Geo., Harrison Co. Ohio, Dearborn, Co. Ind.

Georgia, a country of Asia, called by the Persians, Curdistan, and by the Turks, Guruchi. It is one of the seven Caucasian nations, in the countries between the Black sea and the Caspian. and the lat. of 39. and 43. N., and comprehends the ancient Iberia and Colchis. It is bounded on the N. by Circassia, E. by Daghestan and Schirvan, S. by Armenia, and W. by Cuban, or the new Russian government of Caucasus. It is divided into 9 provinces. Of these, 5 form what is commonly called the kingdom of Georgia; and four the kingdom or principality of Imeritia. The last reigning prince, Heraclius, ceded this country to Russia on his death, which happened in 1800. The hills of Georgia are covered with forests of oak, ash, beech, chestnuts, walnuts, and elms, encircled with vines; growing perfectly wild, but producing vast quantities of grapes, from which much wine and brandy are made. Cotton grows spontaneously, as well as the finest European fruit trees. Rice, wheat, millet, hemp, and flax, are raised on the plains, almost without culture. The valleys afford the finest pasturage, the rivers are full of fish, the mountains abound in minerals, and the climate is healthy. The rivers of Georgia, the principal of which is the Kur, falling into the Caspian Sea, being fed by mountain torrents, are always either too rapid or too shallow for the purposes of navigation. The Georgians are Christians of the Greek communion, and appear to have received their name from their attachment to St. George, the tutelary saint of these countries. Their dress nearly resembles that of the Cossacs; but men of rank frequently wear the habit of Persia. They usually dye their hair, beards, and nails with red. The women employ the same colour to stain the palms of their hands. On their head they wear a cap or fillet, under which their black hair falls on their forehead; behind it is braided into several tresses: their eyebrows are painted with black, in such a manner as to form one entire line and the face is coated with white and red. They are celebrated for their beauty: but their air and manners are extremely voluptuous. The Georgians have great skill in the use of the bow and are deemed excellent soldiers: but the men have no virtue, except courage; fathers sell their children, and sometimes their wives. Both sexes are addicted to drunkenness, and are particularly fond of brandy. The other inhabitants of Georgia are Tartars, Ossi, and Armenians. These last are found all over Georgia, sometimes mixed with the natives, and sometimes in villages of their own. They speak among themselves their own language, but all understand and can talk the Georgians. Besides these there are a considerable number of Jews, some having villages of their own, and others mixed with the Georgian, Armenian and Tartar inhabitants, but never with the Ossi; the aggregate number amount to 320,000. The Christians of the country in part follow the rites of the Armenian, and in part that of the Greek church; and they are represented as the most tractable Christians in the east. Teflis is the capital. See Imeritia.

Georgia, one of the United States of America, bounded N. by Tennessee and N. Carolina, E. by S. Carolina and the ocean; S. by Florida, and W. by Alabama. It lies between 30. 20. and 35. N. lat. and 81. and 86. 48. W. long. It is 300 m. in length from N. to S and 240 in breadth and contains 50,000 sq. m.

The river Savannah washes almost the whole of the eastern boundary. The Ogeechee and Altamaha have their whole course within the state; the Flint and Chatahoochee pass out of the state to the south. There is a small mountainous tract in the north, but nearly the whole country is an unbroken level. The soil is of various qualities. A chain of islands stretching along the whole coast have a fertile soil and produce the first cotton in the world, well known by the name of Sea Island cotton. The land here and along the shore consists of marshy tracts, and swells in the surface called hammoc land. On the Florida border is the great swamp of Okefonoko, (which see.) Beyond is a belt of pine barrens interspersed with swamps. Still farther the country becomes sandy, but towards the hilly region the soil is strong and productive. There are many large forests which afford timber for exportation. In those parts which are flooded by the rivers the land is devoted to the cultivation of rice. The rice plant has a fibrous root, and puts forth stems which grow to the height of 4 and 5 feet. The leaves are long and fleshy, somewhat similar to those of the leek. The flowers are of a purple colour and grow in clusters on the top of the stalks. In the early stages of its growth the rice fields are inundated with water.

The most profitable agricultural employment is the cultivation of cotton. Indigo was formerly produced in considerable quantities, but the culture has almost totally ceased. Slave labour is universally employed, and agriculture as a science has made very little improvement.

The climate in the southern part is hot and unhealthy. Epidemic fevers rage in the summer and autumn, rendering the country unsafe for strangers and even natives. The sea islands however are esteemed salubrious and many of the planters spend the hot season there. In the north, pine forests abound; and here the air is pure and as healthy as in any part of the United States. The heat of summer, is excessive and the annoyance from mosquitoes one of the greatest discomforts imaginable. No sleep can be enjoyed at night without the precaution of placing a mosquito net of gauze at every window. The number of frogs in the swamps and small streams is prodigious. Alligators abound in every stream of the low country. Great numbers of water fowl frequent these parts as well as the beaches and inlets of the sea-coast. The Chuck Will's Widow is one of the most common birds here, but is rarely seen north of Tennessee and Virginia. It is a solitary bird, somewhat resembling the Whip-poor-will, and is often confounded with it. Its name is derived from the notes it utters, sounding exactly like those three words. It begins its call towards evening, and continues with short interruption for several hours. In a still evening it may be heard at the distance of a mile.

Georgia is divided into 76 Counties. The capital is Milledgeville. The largest towns are Savannah and Augusta. It has a university at Athens and a school fund of 500,000 dollars. It has no manufactures. Its trade consists chiefly in the exportation of cotton and rice. The commerce of the state is chiefly carried on by northern vessels. The shipping owned in the state amounted in 1828 to 13,959 tons. The imports in 1829 were 380,293 dollars. The exports of domestic produce 4,980,642 dollars. Total exports, 4,981,376 dollars.

The legislature is called the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The Senators and Representatives are chosen in counties. The Governor is chosen by the legislature for two years. Suffrage is universal. The pop. is 516,567, of whom 217,240 are slaves. In addition to these are the Cherokee Indians, inhabiting the north-western part of the state. See Cherokees.

The Baptists are the most numerous sect in religion; they have 205 ministers. The Methodists have 64; the Presbyterians 31; the Episcopalians 4; the Christians 28 and the Catholics 3.

The first settlement in Georgia was made at Savannah in 1733, consequently it was the latest settled of all the Atlantic states. The present constitution was formed in 1798.

Georgia, or South Georgia, an island in the South Atlantic Ocean, visited by Cook in 1775. It is 64 m. long, and 30 in its greatest breadth. It abounds in bays and harbours, which the vast quantities of ice render inaccessible the greatest part of the year. Here are perpendicular ice cliffs, of considerable height, like those at Spitzbergen; from which pieces were continually breaking off and floating out to sea. The valleys were covered with snow; and the only vegetation observed was bladed grass, wild burnet, and a plant, like moss, which sprung from the rocks. Not a stream of fresh water was to be seen on the whole coast.

Georgia, Gulf of, a gulf of the North Pacific Ocean, between the continent of North America and Quadra and Vancouver Island; about 120 m. in length, from N. to S., but the breadth varies in its different parts from 6 to 20 m. It contains several clusters of islands, and branches off into a great number of canals, most of which were examined by captain Vancouver and his officers.

Gera, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia. It has a castle about a mile from the town, on a mountain in a wood, and is called Osterstein. It is seated on the Elster, 32 m. S. S. W. of Leipzig.

Gerass, a town of Germany, in Hesse-Darmstadt, 8 m. W. N. W. of Darmstadt.

Gerbstadt, a town of Upper Saxony, in the county of Mansfeld, Thuringia, 7 m. N. E. of Mansfeld.

Gerdauen, a town of Prussia, defended by two castles, and seated on the Omet, near a considerable lake, 50 m. S. E. of Königsberg.

Germain, St. a borough in Cornwall, Eng. It was once the largest town in the county, and a bishop's see, but now consists chiefly of fishermen's cottages: it still returns two members to parliament. What remains of the cathedral is used as the parish church; and near it is the priory. It stands near the sea, 10 m. W. of Plymouth, and 228 W. by S. of London.

Germain, St. a town of France, in the department of Seine and Oise, with a magnificent palace, in which Louis XIV. was born. Here James II. found an asylum, when he fled to France. It is seated on the Seine, near a fine forest, 10 m. N. W. of Paris.

German, p.t. Chenango Co. N. Y. Pop. 884. Also townships in Fayette Co. Pa., Clarke, Montgomery and Darke Cos. Ohio, and Cape Girardeau Co. Missouri.

Germanna, p.v. Orange Co. Va. on Rapid Ann river.

German Ocean, or North Sea, is the sea between the E. coast of England, from the straits of Dover to the Shetland Isles, and the coasts of Jutland and Norway, it comprises about 8 degrees of latitude and 10 of longitude.

Germano, St. a town of Piedmont, on the river Naviglio, 9 m. W. of Vercehi, on the line of the canal to Ivrea.

Germano, St. a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, at the foot of Monte Cassino, 17 m. S. S. E. of Sora.

Germantown, p.t. Columbia Co. N. Y. on the river, 12 m. below the city of Hudson. Pop. 967. Also a village in Philadelphia Co. Pa. 6 m. N. of Philadelphia. It contains Mount Airy Academy and is celebrated for a battle fought here Oct. 4, 1777. Also villages in Fauquier Co. Va., Hyde Co. N. C., Bracken Co. Ken.

Germany, an extensive country of Europe, lying between the 45th and 54th degree of N. lat., and 6. to 19. of E. long.; the mean length, however, from N. to S. does not exceed 530 British statute m. and the mean breadth 460 m., comprising an area of about 245,000 square m. It is bounded on the E. by Hungary and Poland, N. by the Baltic Sea and Denmark, W. by the Netherlands and France, and S. by Switzerland and Italy. The extreme S. point jets into the gulf of Venice. Prior to the French revolutionary war, which commenced in 1793, Germany had geographically been divided into 9 circles, politically subdivided into 206 archbishopricks, bishopricks, principalities, dukedoms, marquises, lordships, provinces, &c. under the government of nearly as many sovereign potentates; but the whole of them formed a great confederacy, governed by political laws, at the head of which was an emperor, whose power in the collective body, or diet, was not directive but executive. The western Roman empire, which had terminated in the year 475, in the person of Augustulus, the last

Roman emperor, and which was succeeded by the reign of the Huns, the Ostrogoths, and the Lombards, was revived by Charlemagne, king of France, on Christmas day, in the year 800. This prince being then at Rome, pope Leo III. crowned him emperor, in St. Peter's church; and Nicephorus, who was then emperor of the east, consented to this coronation. The French kept the empire under eight emperors, till the year 912, when Louis III., the last prince of the line of Charlemagne, died without issue male. Conrad, count of Franconia, the son-in-law of Louis, was then elected emperor. Thus the empire went to the Germans, and became elective, having been hereditary under the French emperors. The emperor was chosen by the princes, the lords, and the deputies of cities, till the year 1239, when the number of the electors was reduced to seven; one more was added in 1649, and another in 1692; these nine electors continued to the year 1796, when, in consequence of the alterations made in the constitution of the empire, under the influence of France and Russia, they became ten in number; namely, the elector and archbishop of Ratisbon, the elector and king of Bohemia, (the then emperor) the elector of Bavaria, the elector of Saxony, the elector of Brandenburg (king of Prussia) the elector of Hanover (king of England) the elector of Wurtzburg (late grand duke of Tuscany) the elector of Wurtemberg, the elector of Baden, and the elector of Hesse. On the death of Charles VI. of Austria, in 1740, an emperor was chosen from the house of Bavaria, by the name of Charles VII. On the death of this prince, in 1745, Francis, grand duke of Tuscany, was elected emperor; whose grandson, Francis II., enjoyed the dignity of emperor of Germany till 1806, when he formally resigned the title and office, transferring his title of emperor to his hereditary dominions of Austria.

At the close of the Saxon race, in 1024, the prerogatives of the emperor were very considerable; but, in 1437, they were reduced to the right of conferring all dignities and titles, except the privilege of being a state of the empire; of granting dispensations with respect to the age of majority, of erecting cities, and conferring the privilege of coining money; of calling the meetings of the diet, and presiding in them. But, after all, there was not a foot of land annexed to this title; for ever since the reign of Charles IV., the emperors depended entirely on their hereditary dominions, as the only source of their power, and even of their subsistence. To prevent the calamities of a contested election, a king of the Romans was often chosen in the lifetime of the emperor, on whose death he succeeded to the imperial dignity of course. The emperor (always elected and crowned at Frankfort on the Maine) assumed the title of august, and pretended to be successor to the emperors of Rome. Although he was chief of the empire, the supreme authority resided in the diet, which was composed of three colleges; the college of electors, the college of princes, and the college of imperial towns. The diet had the power of making peace or war, of settling general impositions, and of regulating all the important affairs of the empire; but the decisions had not the force of law till the emperor gave his consent. When a war was determined on, every prince contributed his quota of men and money, as valued in the matriculation roll; though as an elector or prince he might espouse a different side from that of the diet. All the sovereigns of Germany had and still have an absolute authority in their own dominions, and can lay taxes, levy troops, and make alliances, provided they do not prejudice the empire. They determine all civil causes definitely, unless in some particular cases in which an appeal may be made. These appeals were to two courts, called the Imperial Chamber, at Wetzlar; and the Aulic Council, at Vienna.

The three principal religions are, the Roman Catholic, the Lutheran, and the Calvinistic; but Christians of all denominations are tolerated, and there is a multitude of Jews in all the great towns. Germany is watered by numerous rivers, the three principal of which, are the Rhine, the Danube, and the Elbe; the first of these rises in Switzerland, and forms the S. W. boundary of the empire, dividing it from Switzerland and France; it afterwards intersects the N. W. part of Germany and Holland, and falls into the Meuse, near Rotterdam. The Danube rises in Suabia, the S. W. circle of the empire, and by itself and several tributary streams of inferior note, intersects a great portion of the southern part of Germany; it afterwards runs through Hungary and European Turkey, into the Black Sea. The Elbe rises near the centre of the eastern frontier, and runs in a N. W. direction into the North Sea. The Oder intersects all the N. E. part of Germany, and falls into the Baltic Sea. The Weser, the Ems, the Adige, the Drave and other small rivers are navigable, and afford admirable means for facilitating an interchange of productions from one part of the country to the other; but the Oder and the Elbe are the only two that are united by art. The mountains of the south are rich in every kind of metal and semi-metal. The forests supply abundance of the finest timber, and the vine, olive, and mulberry, only require common attention to yield fruit in abundance; while the plains of the north yield a surplus of grain and cattle for exportation, and of wool and flax to furnish materials for extensive manufactures, especially of linens, which are exported in considerable quantities to almost every part of Europe, Africa, and America.

In 1806, the Germanic confederacy was dissolved by Napoleon, and several of the minor states formed into a new confederacy under the title of the confederation of the Rhine; while Westphalia, Wurtemberg and Bavaria, were constituted new and independent kingdoms; Prussia and Austria retaining their respective hereditary dominions; but at the general pacification of Europe, in 1815, the Rhenish confederacy was dissolved, and that of Germany again re-established, with some variations and modifications. In 1825 the confederacy consisted of 35 sovereignties, exclusive of the four free towns of Hamburg, Bremen, Lubec, and Frankfort. No people apply themselves more closely to their studies than the Germans; and the Hebrew is no where so generally learnt, or better understood. Printing is most extensively encouraged; every man of letters is an author: they multiply books without number; thousands of essays and disputations are annually published, with which they overstock the fairs of Frankfort and Leipzig; for no man can be a graduate in the university who has not published one disputation at least. The language of Germany is a dialect of the Teutonic, which succeeded that called the Celtic. The population is estimated at 30,000,000. Vienna is the principal city

Germany, a township in Adams Co. and a village in Somerset Co. Pa.

Gerona, a fortified town of Spain, in Catalonia, and a bishop's see; seated on the Ter, 20 m. from its entrance into the Mediterranean, and 47 N. E. of Barcelona.

Gerry, p.t. Chataque Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,110.

Gers, an interior department in the S. W. of France: it is watered by numerous streams, running from S. to N. into the Garonne, the principal of them is the Gers, which gives name to the department. It contains a strata of pit coal, and has manufactures of wool, linen, and saltpetre; its chief vegetable productions are flax, the vine, and pears. It is divided into four other arrondissements; the chief towns of which are Condom, Lectoure, Lombez, and Mirande.

Gersau, a town of Switzerland, on the lake of Schwiiz, at the foot of the Rigi, 12 m. S. W. of Schwiiz.

Gertruydenburg, a fortified town of South Holland, with a good harbour and salmon fishery on a large lake, called Biesbosch. It has been often taken, the last time by the French in 1793, but soon recovered. It is 7 m. N. by E. of Breda. Long. 4. 52. E., lat. 51. 42. N.

Gerumenha, or Jurumenka, a town of Portugal, in Alentejo, with a strong castle; seated on a hill, near the river Guadiana, 18 m. below Badajoz.

Gesecke, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Westphalia, seated on the Weyck, 11 m. W. S. W. of Paderborn.

Gessenay. See Sanen.

Gestrícia, a province of Sweden, the S. part of Nordland, between Dalecarlia on the W., and the gulf of Bothnia on the E. It is 100 m. long, and 60 broad, diversified by forests, rocks, hills, and dales, lakes, and rivers; and there are numerous mines and forges. Gefle is the capital.

Gettysburg, a town of Pennsylvania, in York Co. situate at the head of Rock creek, 30 m. W. by S. of York.

Gez, a town of France, in the department of Ain, noted for excellent cheese; seated at the foot of Mount St. Claude, between the Rhone, the lake of Geneva, and Switzerland, 10 m. N. W. of Geneva. It is the seat of a prefect.

Geyss, a town of the electorate of Hesse, in the principality of Fulda, seated on the Ulster, 17 m. N. E. of Fulda.

Gezan, or Ghezan, a sea-port of Arabia Felix, which has a considerable trade in senna and coffee; seated on the Red Sea, 90 m. N. W. of Loheia. Long. 43. 15. E., lat. 16. 25. N.

Gezira, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Diarbek, on the island formed by the Tigris, 70 m. N. W. of Monsul. Long. 40. 50. E., lat. 37. 16. N.

Gezula, a province of Morocco, which is very productive, and contains mines of iron and copper. The inhabitants are numerous, and considered as the most ancient people of Africa: they live in tents, are so independent that they are rather the allies than the subjects of the emperor of Morocco.

Ghana, or Gana, a city in Negroland, capital of a country of the same name, governed by a sultan. It stands on the S. side of a large lake, at its outlet, which separates the city into two parts, and soon after joins the river Niger, which is here called Neel il Abeed, or Nile of the Negroes. It is 100 m. E. by S. of Cassina.

Ghaute, the name given to several groups and chains of mountains in Hindoostan. The word signifies 'passes' or 'gates'. These mountains are considered as commencing at Cape Comorin: yet the southern chain, or Malayala mountains form a separate group, terminating in the district of Coimbatore, at the great valley in which the forts of Palikadery and Annamaly are situated.

The Ghauts begin separately on the north of these plains, forming two branches, one running to the east, and the other to the west of north. The eastern Ghauts extend 70 m. beyond Madras, forming the boundaries of the Carnatic, and to the north of that country divide into several branches, in which the mountains are subjected to interruptions, being separated by valleys covered with thick forests. But the principal chain is divided by no hollow grounds, except narrow defiles, which are well lined with fortresses. To the natives, this chain is known by the name of Ellacooda, or the "White Mountains." It then runs along the northern margin of the Circars, forming an uninterrupted series of mountains so close as to afford only two military passes. At the place where the Ghauts separate the Circars from the province of Berar, the mountains become almost inaccessible, and there is only one passage for carriages and for horses, viz. that of Salarghaut which leads to Behar. Nothing is seen on every hand but masses of rock, rising perpendicularly to the clouds, and leaving apparently no outlet for the intimidated traveller. All the summits of this chain are composed of granite, and it every where presents one picture of total barrenness and utter nakedness. Yet large trunks of trees in a state of petrification, are found here, and most particularly in the ravines created by the torrents, where trunks, projecting from the steep sides of the rocks, sometimes serve for bridges.

The western chain of the Ghauts extends along the west coast to a distance of 70 m., and acquires a greater elevation than the eastern chain. Its height has not yet been ascertained by barometrical observations, but it is generally believed to amount to three or four thousand feet. The chain then crosses Kanara and Sunda, passes near to Goa, enters the Mahratta country, and divides into several branches. The closeness of the forests, the depth of the precipices, and the rapidity of the torrents, render these mountains very difficult to cross, and the passage is in many places, 50. or 60 m. long. They are described as containing much limestone, and some basaltic rocks, but no one has deliberately studied the position and materials of the different strata. Towards the sea-coast, the western Ghauts present a magnificent amphitheatre of rocks and verdure, enlivened with towns and villages. The highest, or at least the steepest part to the east of Surat, goes under the name of the Bala-Ghauts, which is sometimes extended to the whole of the western Ghauts, while the eastern chain, together with the intermediate plateau, is called the Paian-Ghauts.

About the sources of the river Godavery, some lower chains are sent off from the mass of the western Ghauts, pass through the interior of the peninsula, and join the mountains of Berar and Gundanwa.

The central chains which run parallel to the course of the Nerbuddah river, one on its north side, and the other on the south, generally pass under the Sanscrit name of the Vindhias; the extent which this name embraces appears somewhat arbitrary to our most learned eastern geographers.

But Arrow smith more positively confines it to the mountains immediately adjoining the Nerbuddah. It is also in these central countries that the Hindoos place their Sanyah and their Sookhian mountains, though they have been mistaken for the western Ghauts.

Ghent, called by the French Gand, the chief town of East Flanders, is situate at the junction of the Scheldt and Lys. Julius Cæsar is said to have been its founder. The Vandals afterwards became its masters, and called it Vanda, or Wanda; of which its present name is by some thought to be a corruption.

This town has been the scene of some diplomatic transactions: the compact of the provinces of the Netherlands against the tyranny of Spain in 1578, called the Pacification of Ghent, was drawn up and executed here; the last treaty of peace concluded between Great Britain and America, in 1814, was signed here also. It was likewise the residence of Louis XVIII. during the period in which he was forced to quit France after the return of Bonaparte from Elba.

Ghent is situate on a beautiful plain: its area may vie in extent with that of any other city in Europe, being little less than fifteen miles in circumference; but no small portion of the enclosed space is covered with gardens, orchards, and fields of grain. Like all other towns in this flat country, it is intersected with numerous canals, crossed by three hundred bridges; some of stone, but most of wood. Their banks, being generally planted with majestic trees, afford an extensive and grateful promenade for the inhabitants. The streets are spacious; though some of the most frequented, as is the case in many old towns, are so narrow that two carriages can scarcely pass each other. There are thirteen public squares, the principal of which is ornamented with a pedestrian statue of Charles V.

The town hall is an immense pile of building, presenting an incongruous combination of various styles of architecture: one front, which is unfinished, is Gothic; another Italian; each story being supported by pillars of a different order;—the ground story Doric, the next Ionic, and the upper Corinthian. It is enriched with many valuable documents of an early period, and with some good paintings.

The structure and arrangements of the public prison or house of correction are on an excellent plan. The building is a spacious octagon, having a large court-yard in the centre, by means of which an immediate and constant communication can be easily kept up with every part. Each department branches off from this; and the prisoners are kept in separate classes, according to the nature of their crimes and the depravity of their character. In the centre of the woman's apartment is a large basin or trough for washing linen. Every prisoner is locked up at night in a separate cell, and brought out to work at a stated hour in the morning. The average number of prisoners is 1,300; the annual expenditure is 50,000 florins, or somewhat more than £4,000 sterling; therefore the cost of each prisoner to the state is less than £4 annually. This economical effect is produced by employing every convict capable of working in some species of industry. The principal portion of the profits is set apart for defraying the expenses of the establishment, and the remainder is divided into two parts; one of which is allowed to the prisoner for pocket-money, and the other forms a fund which he receives on his liberation. Near the prison is the Atelier de Beinfaisance; an institution intended to check mendicity, by supplying the paupers with work until they can provide for themselves.

The Mont de Piete is a singular establishment for lending money upon goods, on the principle of pawn-broking, but upon moderate interest. It has been found very useful, in enabling industrious persons labouring under a temporary pressure to relieve themselves, without the necessity of selling their property under very disadvantageous circumstances, or of disclosing their pecuniary difficulties.

All the public arrangements of Ghent seem to have been devised with a systematic intention of stimulating industry, correcting idleness, and encouraging habits of order and cleanliness. Three times every day, at sunrise, at noon, and in the evening, the ear of the observing traveller is struck with the tolling of a bell. Its sound serves not only as a signal to summon the workman to his appointed place of labour, but as a warning to the rest of the inhabitants not to appear in the streets at these hours; lest the progress of the former, while crowding to their occupations, should experience any obstruction. For the same reason, the drawbridges are not allowed to be then open.

The splendour of Ghent is most observable in its churches; and of these the most magnificent is that of St. Bavon. The choir is supported by pillars of pure white Italian marble, rendered more striking from the contrast of the highly-polished black marble with which all the walls of the interior are coated. The principal church is surrounded by twenty-four chapels, each adorned with some splendid work of the most admired masters. The pulpit is a piece of exquisite workmanship, forming an allegorical picture of Time contemplating Truth. The figures of angels at the foot of its staircase are objects of peculiar admiration. Beneath the present cathedral the body of the original church still remains, little injured by time, forming a subterraneous place of worship: it is now chiefly used as a school for Sunday instruction. The tower or steeple is ascended by 446 steps; and like all others in this flat country, presents an extensive view of the surrounding towns and scenery. It has a remarkably fine ring of bells, which includes semitones, and is sounded by keys and levers like an organ.

One of the few monastic institutions of Belgium, exists in Ghent. It is a convent of Beguine-nuns, which escaped the effects of the emperor Joseph's reformation of the conventual societies, and still more destructive ravages of the subsequent revolution in France. Strangers are admitted to some parts of the building, and particularly the chapel, during the time of divine service.

The great provincial school or college of Ghent has long been in much repute as a place of education. On the formation of the kingdom of the Netherlands, it was advanced to the rank of a royal university. According to its present arrangements, it has nineteen professors; five of medicine, three of law, five of natural science and mathematics, and six of philosophy and literature: the number of students exceeds 400. The palace of the university, in which the lectures are delivered, is a splendid edifice. The great hall is sufficiently spacious to accommodate 1,600 persons: it is divided into two parts; one for the members of the university, the other for the accommodation of the public. Around the walls the arms of the nineteen provinces of the Netherlands are emblazoned. It is lighted by a lantern sixty feet in circumference, in the middle of the dome. From the hall the apartments for the different courses of instruction branch on each side. The cabinet of natural history is one hundred and twenty feet long, and already well furnished: that of mineralogy is one hundred and thirty feet long, and contains several thousand specimens scientifically arranged. There is also a fine dissecting room, and a cabinet of models of agricultural implements.

Between Ghent and Antwerp lies a tract of land called the Pays de Waes. It was originally a barren and shifting sand; but the persevering industry of the inhabitants has rendered it the admiration of every visitor, whether native or foreigner. It is throughout divided into small fields, each surrounded by a low quickset hedge and a deep trench. The middle of every field is elevated and the ground declines in all directions to the ditch. The object of this singular mode of husbandry is to prevent the bad effects of heavy rains, which, if they fell upon the level surface, consisting of dry porous sand, would carry down the manure through it, and render it useless; whereas the water, as it falls on the declivity, glides down more gently, and does no injury. The farms are so small, and the cottages so closely intermixed, that the whole exhibits the appearance of one continued village. The interior of each dwelling presents an aspect of neatness and comfort fully corresponding with what might be expected from the exterior appearance of their farms.

Ghent is situate thirty miles S. W. of Antwerp. Lat. 51. 3. N., long. 8. 44. E. Population 78,000.

Ghergong, a city and the capital of the kingdom of Assam. It is seated on the Legoo, near its conflux with the Burrampooter, 400 m. N. E. of Calcutta. Long. 93. 36. E., lat. 25. 36. N.

Gheriah, a sea port of Hindoostan, on the coast of Concan. It was the capital of Angria, a famous piratical prince, whose fort here was taken by the English and Mahrattas, in 1756, and his whole fleet destroyed. It is 165 m. S. by E. of Bombay. Long. 73. 8. E., lat. 16. 45. N.

Ghilan, a province of Persia, on the S. W. side of the Caspian Sea, supposed to be the Hyrcania of the ancients. On the W. side are high mountains which are covered with many sorts of trees, and in the highest parts of them are deer, bears, wolves, leopards and tigers. It produces abundance of silk, oil, wine, rice, tobacco, and excellent fruit. This province was ceded to Russia, by a treaty concluded at Petersburg in 1724, but not possessed by Russia till 1780. Reshd is the capital.

Ghizni, or Gazna, a town of the country of Cabul, once the capital of a powerful empire of the same name. It is called the second Medina, from the great number of illustrious persons who have been interred here. It is 64 m. S. of Cabul. Long. 68. 20. E., lat. 38. 40. N.

Gibello, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Parma, on the river Po, sixteen miles N. W. of Parma.

Gibraltar, a town of Spain, near a mountain of the same name in lat. 36. 6. N. Long. 5. 19. W. It is the ancient Calpe, one of the pillars of Hercules, the other being Ceuta on the African coast. It is a rocky promontory on the southern extremity of Andalusia, from 3 to 4 m. in length, and about half a m. in its utmost breadth. Steep in all parts and in some perpendicular, it seemed formed by nature for a strong hold; and since it became an English fortress, it has been rendered impregnable. The name, originally Gebel-Tarif, the rock of Tarif, is derived from Tarik or Tarif Abenzaca, general of the caliph Walid in the invasion of 711, who landed here, and conquered the town of Hercules at the foot of the mountain. Gibraltar is joined to the main land by an isthmus on the north which is about a mile and a half in length: the northern front of the rock is almost perpendicular; the east side is full of precipices; and the south is so narrow and abrupt as to be inaccessible to any enemy at sea. The western front is also precipitous, but affords a landing place on the level tract of ground which forms the site of the town; and this part is protected by batteries and other strong works of defence. The straits to which Gibraltar gives name are supposed to commence in Spain at Cape Trafalgar, and in Africa at Cape Spartel, between which points they are 70 m. wide; and to end toward the Mediterranean, beyond Gibraltar and Ceuta; the entire length being about 100 m. and the narrowest part, about three leagues west of Gibraltar, 15 m. A strong current always runs from the ocean into the Mediterranean.

The noble bay of Gibraltar, 9 m. long and 5 broad, forms a most important naval station. On the east are the promontory and isthmus; to the south is the sea; to the west and north the main land of Spain; but the promontory wholly commands the bay.

Gibraltar was strongly fortified by the Moors after their own manner. It was taken in 1302 by Ferdinand II. of Castile; regained by the Moors in 1333; and recovered in 1462 by Henry IV. The emperor Charles V. caused the fortification to be reconstructed by two of the most eminent engineers of his time. The natural and artificial strength of the place having been thenceforth regarded as unquestionable by the other maritime powers, the Spanish government seems to have been lulled into a dangerous security respecting it; for in August, 1704, during the war of succession, when an expedition under admiral Rooke and prince George of Hesse-Darmstadt suddenly and unexpectedly appeared in the bay, this maritime strong hold was held only by a drowsy garrison of 80 men, who immediately surrendered. Philip of Anjou besieged it in October; but in the brief interval the English had so strongly fortified it on the land side, that the pass of the isthmus was called by the Spaniards the Gate of Fire. It was blockaded with 24 ships of war by admiral Poyetz, but received succours from the English and Dutch fleet under admiral Leake. The land blockade lasted until the peace of Utrecht. From that time England omitted no expense or exertion to render the place wholly impregnable. Another siege, in 1727, was frustrated by the arrival of admiral Wager with 11 sail of the line. Spain offered two millions sterling for the restitution of Gibraltar; but was obliged to resign all title and pretension to it in the treaty of Seville 1729. She immediately endeavoured to diminish its advantages and deteriorate its value as a colony and a place of commerce, by interdicting all intercourse between it and her own territory, and by strengthening the military lines of San Roque and Algeiras. But the town and garrison could easily be furnished with supplies while England retained the empire of the sea; and the rock itself had a well of fresh water, with some other resources which science and skill might daily improve. The most strenuous efforts for its recovery were made during the war of the American revolution, when its preservation depended mainly on the valour and constancy of its resident governor, general Elliot. The preparatory hostile operations were commenced in 1779, and continued during the two following years. In June, 1782, the duke de Crillon, commander of the Spanish army that had taken Minorca, arrived with reinforcements, and the French princes of the blood came to be present at the siege. Their army amounted to 30,000 men; and the conquest was to be completed by ten floating batteries, impenetrable by shot or shells, and mounted with 147 brass and 150 iron guns. They were manned by criminals, who in reward for good service, were promised their liberty and yearly pensions of 200 livres each. The garrison had varied from 5,600 to 7,000 men. The most dreadful carnage was to be apprehended as the consequence of a successful assault. On the 13th of September, the floating bulwarks approached and opened their fire. General Elliot, finding ordinary means of repulse unavailing, determined to batter them with red-hot shot; and while deliberating on the means of heating the balls, a German nail-smith, named Schwankendieck, invented and constructed a furnace for the purpose. From this the artillery was so well served, that in the course of the cannonade 4,000 red-hot balls were discharged. In the afternoon, the chief battery and two floating batteries began to emit smoke: the enemy were unable to quench the fire or stop the leakage. At one o'clock in the morning, three batteries were in a blaze, and several others were seen to have taken fire. Those on board in vain signalled the Spanish fleet with rockets; no relief could be afforded to the batteries; all that could be attempted was to save the men. Twelve gun-boats from the fortress, prevented the boats of the besiegers from landing, and at the same time poured a well directed fire on the floating batteries. At day-break, those on board were seen making signals of distress and calling for help, and the besiegers hastened to their relief, amidst continually increasing danger; for the heated guns of the batteries on fire were from time to time discharging their shot, and occasional explosions of gunpowder scattered destruction around. Captain Curtis and his men, at the peril of their lives, saved 13 officers and 344 men. A grand attack on the land side was in the mean time repulsed by general Elliot; and a severe storm occurred, from which the Spanish fleet sustained great damage. Next month, an English squadron having arrived with succours, the enemy were compelled to convert the siege into a mere blockade, which terminated on the 20th January, 1783, when peace was signed at Versailles.

The town of Gibraltar, situated at the foot of the promontory, on its north-west side, suffered severely during this attack, and was rebuilt on an improved plan. The houses have flat roofs and large bow windows; they are generally painted black, to mitigate the rays of the sun, and are marked with a white stripe between each story. The principal street, about a mile in length, is full of shops; in other parts of the town the buildings are too dense, and the population dwelling in them is exposed to much danger in case of pestilential fever. That which raged in 1804 carried off several thousands; while the military, stationed on higher ground, were, by that advantage, and through the judicious precautions adopted by the medical staff, preserved from contagion. It has been ascertained that the fever is fostered, if not generated, during sultry weather, by the stoppage of the drains; and a proposal has been made to erect a steam-engine; which shall raise from the bay a constant stream of water, to supply all the baths and refresh every corner of the town.

The inhabitants, exceeding in number 12,000, are mostly British; though there are many Spaniards, Italians, Jews, and even Moors, occupied in commercial pursuits. Gibraltar is a general mart of merchandise from every quarter: pieces goods and hardware from England; sugar, rum, coffee, from the West Indies; tobacco, rice and flour, from North America; wine, fruits, and silks from the countries and isles of the Mediterranean. The chief public buildings are the barracks, the house of the lieutenant-governor, the navy hospital, and the victualling office. The places of worship are, at the English church, a catholic chapel and three synagogues. For the use of the officers stationed on this isolated rock, there is a garrison library; and a small theatre augments the limited range of amusement which can here be generally participated. The town is fortified; but owes its chief protection to the batteries on the neighbouring heights, which sweep the isthmus and the approach from the sea. Since the siege of 1783, great sums have been expended on these works: extensive excavations have been made, to establish communication between the different posts, and enable them to be relieved without loss from an enemy's fire: the embellishments of which so rugged a spot is susceptible have not been neglected;—trees, shrubs, and flowers have been planted in various places; and roads opened in the solid rock, and made passable for carriages.

Gibraltar, a town of Colombia, in the province of Zulia, defended by some fortifications. The air is so unhealthy in the rainy season, that the town is now reduced to an insignificant hamlet.

Gimont, a town of France, in the department of Gers, 16 m. E. of Auch.

Gingee, a town of Hindoostan, in the Carnatic, strong both by nature and art, being seated on a mountain, whose top is divided into 3 points, on each of which is a castle. It is 38 m. N. W. of Pondicherry. Long. 79. 35. E., lat. 12. 15. N.

Giorgiev, or Giurdosov, a town of European Turkey, in Walachia, near which the Russians gained a victory over the Turks, in 1771. It is seated on the Danube, 48 m. S. W. of Bucharest.

Giovenazzo, a town of Naples, in Terra di Bari, with a castle. It has high houses and towers, built of polished stone with flat roofs, which give it a singular appearance. It is seated near the sea, 10 m. N. W. of Bari.

Girardeau, Cape, a county of the state of Missouri, lying between the St. Francis and Mississippi rivers; it contains about 1,200 sq. m. of surface. Pop. 7,430. Jackson is the chief town.

Girrest, a town of Persia, in Kerman, with a trade in wheat and dates, 100 m. E. by N. of Gombroon.

Girge, a town of Egypt, about 3 m. in circumference, and contains several mosques, bazars, and squares, but no marble buildings, or remains of ancient structures. It stands near the left bank of the Nile, 40 m. N. of Esne, and 200 S. of Cairo. Long. 31. 12. E., lat. 28. 35. N.

Girgenti, an episcopal town, on the S. W. coast of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, with a castle. It is part of the ancient Agrigentum, and in the vicinity are numerous remains of temples, &c.; great quantities of sulphur are exported from this place. It stands on a hill, near the river St. Blaise, 62 m. S. of Palermo. Long. 13. 38. E., lat. 37. 14. N.

Gironde, a river of France, formed by the union of the Garonne and Dordogne, 12 m. N. of Bordeaux.

Gironde, a maritime department of France, which includes part of the late province of Guienne. It lies on both sides of the Garonne, and it is the largest of the 86 departments, containing about 1,022,000 hectares; it yields abundance of wine, and is fertile in every kind of grain and cattle, whilst the rivers and coast supply abundance of fish. Its principal manufactures are in foundries, glass, earthenware, dye stuffs, liquors, (anniseed) and salt; it contains some seams of pit coal, and beds of peat. It is divided into 6 arrondissements, of which Bordeaux, (the capital,) Bazas, Blaye, Lesparre, Libourne, and Reole are the chief towns. Pop. in 1825, 522,040.

Girons, St. a town of France, in the department of Arriege, 4 m. S. by E. of St. Lizier.

Girvan, a town of Scotland, in Ayrshire, at the mouth of the river Girvan, which forms a tolerable harbour. It is 16 m. S. S. W. of Ayr.

Gisborough, a town in North Yorkshire, Eng. It is celebrated for being the first place where alum was made, as it was formerly for its fine abbey. It is 22 m. N. W. of Whithy.

Gisors, a town of France, in the department of Eure, seated on the Ept, 25 m. S. E. of Rouen.

It is 15 m. N. E. of Rocroy. Pop. in 1825, 4,068.

Giula or Guliest, a strong town of Upper Hungary, on the frontiers of Transylvania and the river Keresabla, 30 m. E. of Great Waradin. Long. 20. 40 E., lat. 46. 40. N.

Giula Nuova, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Ulteriore, near the gulf of Venice, 13 m. N. of Atri.

Giuliani, a town of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, on a craggy rock, 12 m. N. N. E. of Xacca or Saccà.

Gizeh, a fortified town of Egypt, with a palace, several mosques, a cannon foundry, and a manufacture of coarse earthen pots and tiles. A few m. to the S. W. are the largest pyramids in the country. Gizeh was taken from the French by the British in 1801. It stands on the left bank of the Nile, nearly opposite Cairo.

Glabach, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers, with a Benedictine abbey. It has manufactures of fine strong linen, and is seated on the Ners, 18 m. N. of Juliers. Pop. about 6,000.

Gladenbach, a town of Germany, in Upper Hesse, 12 m. N. of Giessen.

Glamis, a town of Scotland, in Angusshire, with manufactures of yarn and linen cloth. Near it, on the bank of the Dean, is Glamis Castle, a large edifice, in which Malcolm II. was murdered.

Glamorganshire, the extreme S. E. county of Wales, bounded on the S. for about 50 m. by the Bristol Channel, on the E. by the county of Monmouth N. by Brecknock, and W. by Caremarthenshire. It contains 792 sq. m. of surface, or about 506,880 acres; is divided into ten hundreds, and 124 parishes; has 1 city and 5 market-towns; and sends 2 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants in 1811 was 85,067, increased in 1821 to 101,737. On the N. side it is mountainous; but being more level on the S. side, it there bears large crops of corn and very sweet grass. Cattle abound in all parts, there being fruitful valleys among the mountains, that yield very good pasture. The quantity of butter with which it supplies the Bristol market is very considerable. In the N. part of the county are the most extensive iron works in the world, (see Merthyr Tydvil;) copper and lead also abound. (see Swansea.) The county is intersected from N. to S. by several streams of water, and by 3 canals, by which the heavy products of the mines and forges are conveyed to the coast. Cardiff, (which see,) is the assize town, but Merthyr Tydvil is the most populous, and Swansea the most important town in the county; the other towns of note are Neath, Llantrissant, Cowbridge, and Landaff.

Glandfordbridge, or Brigg, a town in Lincolnshire, with a market on Thursday, and a good trade in corn, coal, and timber. It is seated on the Ancholm, which is navigable for sloops to the Humber, 23 m. N. of Lincoln.

Glaris, or Glarus, a canton of Switzerland, bounded on the N. by the river Linth, Grisons, and lake of Wallenstadt, E. by the canton of Sargans, the canton of Uri, and W. by that of Schwitz. It is a mountainous country; and the chief trade is in cattle, cheese, and butter. The inhabitants, amounting to 27,000, are partly protestants, and partly catholics; and both sects live together in the greatest harmony. Glaris is surrounded by the Alps, except toward the N.; and there is no other entrance but through this opening, which lies between the lake of Wallenstadt, and the mountains separating this canton from that of Schwitz.

Glaris, a town of Switzerland, capital of the preceding canton is surrounded by mountains, and seated on the river Linth. It had manufactures of cloth, and a trade in cattle, horses, cheese, slate, and wooden ware; 32 m. S. E. of Zurich.

Glasgow, a large and populous city of Scotland, in Lanarkshire. From its extent, beauty, regularity, and modern improvements, it is undoubtedly the second if not first city in North Britain. The four principal streets, which intersect each other at right angles, divide the city nearly into four equal parts. The high church, the most magnificent gothic structure in Scotland, St. Andrew's church, St. Enoch's church, the Tron church, the college, the Tontine, and trades'-hall, are some of the principal buildings in Glasgow. The town-house is an elegant building with a piazza in front; and opposite to it is the exchange, a square building, with an equestrian statue of William III. in the centre. The toll-booth, the guildhall, and the theatre are also worthy of notice. There are several charitable establishments; particularly the Merchant's Hospital, and that of the town, and a large infirmary. Here is also a monument, 145 feet high, in the green of Glasgow, to the memory of the gallant Nelson. The university, instituted in 1450, is constantly increasing in reputation. At present it consists of a chancellor, rector, dean of faculty, a principal, and 16 professors, of which one is for law, four for theology, five for the study of medicines and subjects connected therewith, and the others for the faculty of arts. It has lately been greatly enriched in the mathematical department by the library of the late celebrated Dr. Robert Simpson, author of the translation of Euclid, and has received an important addition, by a collection of rare books and manuscripts, in every department of science, but particularly in medicine, bequeathed by the late Dr. William Hunter, who has also left his extensive museum to the university of Glasgow. Besides the anatomical preparations, the museum, for which an elegant building has been erected, contains a collection of shells, corals, insects, and fossils, made by the late Dr. Fothergill, and a cabinet of medals and coins, ancient and modern, the most complete of the kind in Europe. The observatory is well fitted up, and supplied with the most improved instrument for the use of the professor of practical astronomy. But being mainly dependent on private aid for support, since the novelty of its erection has ceased, it is not maintained without difficulty. Glasgow, next to London and Liverpool, is the most commercial place in the British dominions, and in manufacturing extent and importance, it is only exceeded by Manchester and Leeds; the cotton manufacture employs about 40,000 looms, with all the attending operations of staining, dyeing, glazing, &c. &c., which support numerous iron foundries, machine makers, &c. &c.; in addition to which, it has several glass houses, sugar refineries, &c. Glasgow was originally one parish, but is now for the benefit of the poor and ease of ministers, divided into 12, with as many churches, and several chapels of ease, and numerous meeting houses for Dissenters. The population of 10 parishes within the city, in 1821, amounted to 72,765, the Barony 51,919, and Gorbals 22,359, making an aggregate population of 147,043, being 63,274 more than in 1801, and more than treble the number in 1780. The city of Glasgow is seated on the N. bank of the Clyde, the suburbs extending to the opposite side connected by three elegant bridges of stone. The river is navigable for vessels of eight feet water as far as the bridge; but larger vessels stop at Port Glasgow, or Greenock, at the mouth of the river to unload; it has also the advantage of two canals, beside the great canal that joins the Clyde to the Forth. Glasgow is 44 m. W. of Edinburgh, and 60 S. W. of Perth: the mean distance from London, is only 345 m. the route of the mail 404.

Glastenbury, p.t. Hartford Co. Conn. Pop. 2,980.

Glastenbury, t. Bennington Co. Vt. Pop. 52.

Glastenbury, a town of Somersetshire, Eng. it is seated near a high hill, called the Tor, and famous for an abbey, that occupied an area of 60 acres, of which some considerable ruins still remain; particularly the kitchen which is the most entire, and of a very unusual contrivance. The George Inn was formerly an hospital for the accommodation of pilgrims who came to the abbey and to the thorn, which, it is pretended, was planted by Joseph of Arimathea, and blossomed on Christmas eve. It was also pretended, that the bodies of Joseph of Arimathea, of king Arthur, and of Edward the confessor were buried here. The last abbot of this place was hanged on the top of the Tor, by order of Henry VIII. for not acknowledging his supremacy; and on this hill is a tower, which serves as a landmark to seamen. Glastonbury has two churches, and a manufacture of worsted stockings. It is seated on the river Brue, 6 m. S. W. of Wells, on the road to Exeter, and 124 W. by S. of London.

Glatz, a sovereign county of Germany, lying between Silesia, Bohemia, and Moravia, surrounded by mountains. It is 40. m. long, and 25 broad; has mines of coal, copper and iron, good quarries of marble and stone, and fine springs of mineral waters. In 1742, it was ceded to the king of Prussia, by the queen of Hungary, and is now deemed a part of Silesia.

Glatz, a strong town of Silesia, capital of the county of Glatz, seated on the side of a hill, by the river Neiss. On the top of the hill is an ancient castle, and a new citadel. In 1742, the Prussians took the town by capitulation; and in 1760, the Austrians took it by storm, but restored it in 1763. It is 60 m. S. S. W. of Breslau, and 90 E. N. E. of Prague. Long. 16. 32. E., lat. 50. 18. N.

Glauchau, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, with considerable manufactures of cotton and other stuffs; seated on the Mulda, 36 m. S. by E. of Leipzig.

Gleiwitz, a town of Silesia, noted for the culture of hops and the weaving of cloth; 34 m. S. E. of Oppelen.

Glenluce, a town of Scotland, in Wigtonshire, with a harbour for small vessels.

Glenn, p.v. Gloucester Co. Pa.

Glenns Falls, on the Hudson 25 m. above Albany. They are a violent rapid descending 63 feet in 500. The stream is divided by the rocks into three channels. A village of the same name is situated a quarter of a mile from the falls.

Glogau, or Gnoss Glogau, a town of Silesia, capital of a principality of the same name, which is very fertile, and produces wine. The town is well fortified, and formerly stood close by the Oder, which has since changed its course, and now flows above a m. from it. Besides the papists, there are a great number of protestants and Jews. It was taken by the king of Prussia, in 1741. It is 60 m. N. W. of Breslau. Long. 16. 14. E., lat. 51. 38. N.

Glogau, Little, a town of Silesia, with a collegiate church and Minorite convent, 23 m. S. of Oppelen.

Glomme, a river of Norway, in the bishopric of Aggerhuys, which flows into the North Sea, at Frederickstadt. At least 50,000 trees are annually floated by this river to Frederickstadt.

Glossop, a parish of Derbyshire, Eng. which contains 18 townships and hamlets: total pop. in 1821, 13,766. The township of the same name contained 1,357 inhabitants. It is 8 m. N. of Chapel-in-le-frith.

Gloucestershire, a county of England, 60 m.

long, and 29 broad; bounded on the W. by Herefordshire and Monmouthshire, N. by Worcestershire, E. by Warwickshire, and Oxfordshire, and S. by Wiltshire and Somersetshire. It contains 803,000 acres; is divided into 27 hundreds, and 339 parishes; has two cities and 25 market-towns; and sends 10 members to parliament. The air is sharp in the E., or hilly part, called the Cotswold; but very mild in the rich vale that occupies the centre, through which the river Severn flows. The W. part which is the smallest district, is varied by hill and dale, and is chiefly occupied by the forest of Dean. The staple commodities of the county are its woollens and cheese. Its principal rivers are the Severn, Warwickshire Avon, Lower Avon, Wye, Thames, Coln, and Lech; the Severn and Thames are united by a canal. The principal manufacturing towns are Stroud-water, Tewkesbury, and Wotton-under-edge, and the other places of note besides the capital and city of Bristol, are Cheltenham, Cirencester, and Dursley.

Gloucester, a city and capital of the preceding county. It is a county of itself, governed by a mayor, and seated on the E. side of the Severn, where, by two streams, it makes the isle of Alney. It was fortified with a wall, which Charles II. after the Restoration ordered to be demolished. The four principal streets have their junction in the centre of the town. It once contained 11 churches, but now has only 5 beside the cathedral, in which is a large cloister, a whispering gallery, and the tombs of Robert, duke of Normandy, and Edward II. It has five hospitals, two free-schools, and a large county jail. It has four extensive establishments for the manufacture of pins, and is a great mart for wool, and there are 12 incorporated trading companies. Ships come up by the Severn to the bridge; but the navigation being circuitous and difficult, a canal is made hence to Berkeley, with sufficient depth of water for ships of 400 tons burthen, at the head of which is a basin, fit for the reception of 100 vessels. Berkeley is distant from Gloucester 15 m. The city and neighbourhood contain many remains of abbeys; and those of Lantony abbey, in the S. suburb, are converted into outhouses belonging to adjacent farms. Gloucester is 24 m. N. E. of Bristol, and 104 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1801, 7,559, and in 1821, 9,744.

Graciosa, one of the Azores, 10 m. long and 8 broad. Its produce is wheat, wine, butter, and cheese. The principal place is Plata. Long. 27. 58., W. lat. 39. 2. N.

Gradisca, a fortified town of Slavonia, on the frontier of Croatia, seated on the Save, 20 m. S. W. of Posega. Long. 18. 39. E., lat. 45. 21. N.

Gradisca, a strong town of Friuli, on the confines of Carinthia, capital of the county united with Goritz, and a bishop's see. It is seated on the Lisonzo, 6 m. S. W. of Goritz. Long. 13. 32. E., lat. 46. 2. N.

Grado, a town of Italy, in a small island of the same name, on the coast of Friuli, 50 m. E. by N. of Venice. Long. 13. 10. E., lat. 45. 46. N.

Graff Reynet, the most eastern of the four districts, in the territory of the Cape of Good Hope, bounded on the E. by the county of the Caffres and N. by that of the Hottentots.

Grafton, a county of the state of New Hampshire, bounded on the W. 55 m. by the Connecticut river, which divides it from the State of Vermont; it is about 28 m. in mean breadth, and contains a pop. of 38,691. Haverhill, on the E. bank of the Connecticut is the chief town.

Grafton, t. Grafton Co. N. H. 36 m. from Concord. Pop. 1,207. Mica in large sheets popularly termed isinglass, is found in abundance in this town and exported to foreign parts.

Grafton, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 44 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 1,889. Also a p.t. Windham Co. Vt. 22 m. S. Windsor. Pop. 1,439. Also a p.t. Rensselaer Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,681.

Grain Coast, a maritime country of Guinea, extending along the Atlantic about 300 m. between the Sierra Leone country on the W., and the Ivory coast on the E. The productions are peas, beans, gourds, lemons, oranges, dates, and palm wine; but the chief article is the abundance of Guinea pepper, or grains of paradise, which form a great interior and export trade. Cows, hogs, sheep and goats, are numerous. The Portuguese had formerly the whole commerce of this coast, but it has long been chiefly in the hands of the English and Dutch.

Graitz, or Greiz, a town of Upper Saxony, with a castle on a rocky mountain, and another in the town. It has manufactures of stuff, and is situate on the Elster, between mountains and woods, 10 m. N. of Plauen, and 50 S. of Leipzig. Pop. about 6,000.

Gramat, a town of France, 28 m. N. N. E. of Cahors. Pop. 3,295.

Grammont, a town of Flanders, seated on both sides of the Dender, 18 m. N. E. of Tournay.

Grampian Hills, a chain of hills in Scotland, which extend in a N. E. direction, from the mountain Ben Lomona Dumbartonshire, through the counties of Perth, Angus, and Kincardine, to Aberdeen; and thence in a N. W. direction, through the counties of Aberdeen, Banff, and Murray, to the borders of Inverness. They take their name from a single hill, the Mons Grampius of Agricola, where Galgacus waited the approach of Agricola, and where the battle was fought, so fatal to the brave Caledonians.

Grampound, a borough in Cornwall, Eng. with a manufacture of gloves; seated on the Fal, 40 m. S. W. of Launceston, and 244 W. by S. of London; it formerly returned two members to parliament, but was disfranchised at the general election in 1820.

Gran, a town of Lower Hungary, and an arch bishop's see; seated near the conflux of the Gran with the Danube, 70 m. E. S. E. of Presburg. Long. 18. 46. E., lat. 47. 46. N.

Gran, or Gran, a sea-port of Arabia, in the province of Bahrin, at the N. W. end of the gulf of Persia, and on the borders of Irac Arabi, 40 m. S. of Bassora. Long. 47. 45. E., lat. 29. 56 N.

Granada. See Grenada.

Granada, a maritime province, formerly a kingdom of Spain, part of Andalusia, having about 270 m. of sea coast, on the Mediterranean; the mean length of the province from W. to E. being about 234 m., the extreme breadth at the E. end is about 95 m. but the W. part not more than 30, its superficies not exceeding 805 sq. leagues. Pop. in 1810 692,924. It is bounded on the E. by the kingdom of Seville, N. by those of Cordova and Jaen, and W. by Murcia. Though a mountainous country, the soil is good; but it has not been well cultivated since the Moors were expelled in 1492. However, it produces corn, wine, oil, sugar, flax, hemp, excellent fruits, honey, wax, and mulberry-trees, which feed a great number of silk-worms. The forests produce galls, nuts, palm-trees, and oaks. It is intersected by several streams falling into the Mediterranean, but the principal rivers run from E. to W. into the Guadalquivir through Cordova and Seville. Granada was the last province in Spain occupied by the Moors. The principal towns on the coast of the Mediterranean, beginning at the W. are Marbella, Malaga, Almunecar, Motril, Adra, Almeria, and Vera, and in the interior, Granada, (the capital) Ronda, Velez Malaga, Santa Fe. Guadix, Baza, Huescar, and Purchena.

Granada, a city of Spain the capital of the kingdom of that name, is situated near the confluence of the Xenil and the Darro, at the foot of the highest mountain in the Peninsula, the Sierra Nevada, and on the verge of that fertile district called the Vega de Granada. Notwithstanding its vicinity to the snow-clad Alpujarras, the winters are mild in Granada, and the climate is healthy and agreeable. The number of houses is 12,000, and the pop. according to the last census, was 68,295. In commerce and splendour the city has much declined notwithstanding the fertility of its territory. It rose to its highest prosperity under the Moors, by whom it was occupied soon after their first invasion of Spain in 711: it became a royal residence in 1013; during two centuries retained that distinction; and was not finally surrendered to the Spaniards until 1492. Of its magnificent edifices, the most notable are the palace of the Alhambra and the Generalife, or pleasure-house and garden of the Moorish kings. The Alhambra, with its 30 towers, alone occupies the space of a town, and is situated on a hill, fronting that called the Alcanaza, and separated from it by the rapid Darro. The ascent to the Alhambra is through groves of poplars and orange-trees, with fountains by the road side.

The outer walls inclose a large area, surrounding the inner walls; and a number of tanks or cisterns occupy the space between these and the Moorish palace,—a congeries of buildings chiefly remarkable for their interior decorations. The chambers are all paved with marble, and ornamented with marble pillars, sustaining arches of pure Arabic form: they are adorned with stucco, and with a species of porcelain which freshly retains its gilding after a lapse of 5 centuries. The Court of the Lions, so called from the sculptures which adorn its fountain, has no fewer than 158 marble pillars.

The hall of the Abencerrages is so called from the massacre of that illustrious tribe, said to have been here perpetrated by Boabdil the last king of Granada. They were the objects of envy to the Zegrjs and the Gomeles, by whom they were falsely accused of treason to the king; and one of them was charged with illicit intercourse with the queen. In consequence of this charge, the monarch beheaded 86 of the Abencerrages (or, according to some statements, 35) in one day. The sultana committed her defence to 4 Christian knights, her champions, who each overcame the accuser with whom he fought, and vindicated both her character and that of the noble family which had been slaughtered. The common people fancy that in the alabaster bason, which is in the centre of the apartment, they can discern traces of the blood of those brave men; but the unanimous opinion of enlightened travellers is, that these ensanguined stains are nothing more than the effects of time and exposure to he air.

This hall appears to have been a central saloon, communicating with the other apartments of the palace. Every possible variety of combination which could be devised by ingenuity, was employed to decorate the wall and ceiling, and the style of execution is the most exquisite that can be conceived. The lines regularly cross each other in a thousand forms, and after manifold windings return to the spot whence they begin.

The ceiling is equally extraordinary and worthy of admiration; it represents a series of grottoes from which depend stalactites, painted of various colours.

The Golden Saloon, so termed by the Arabs from the profusion of gold ornaments which it contained, was appropriated to the reception of ambassadors, from which circumstance the Spaniards have designated it La Sala de los embajadores. It is situated in the lofty tower called the Comaresh; is 36 feet square, and 64 feet 4 inches high, from the floor to the highest part of the ceiling. The walls are, on three sides, fifteen inches thick, and on the fourth side nine. The lower range of windows is thirteen feet in height. The grand entrance to this noble hall is through an arched doorway, admirably finished, and embellished with flowers and arabesques in stucco: they were blue and gold, but the gilding is now almost entirely effaced. Over the principal door is an Arabic inscription, which appears to have been executed in a style corresponding to the rest of the edifice: it is taken, with the exception of its concluding sentence, from the Koran. On entering the Hall of Ambassadors, the beholder is lost in astonishment at the exquisite taste and elegance of execution which characterise every part of it; and if thus superb, even in its present deserted state, observes Mr. Murphy, how resplendent must this golden saloon have been, when the sovereign, arrayed in all the pomp of oriental magnificence, assembled his brilliant court to give audience to the representatives of neighbouring monarchs!

The whole floor is inlaid with mosaic. The same kind of ornament, but of different patterns, covers every part of the walls, interspersed with flowers and Arabic inscriptions executed in porcelain, with exquisite taste, so as to unite and harmonise exactly with the stucco ornaments that every where abound.

The most remarkable part of the Alhambra, for exterior beauty, is the palace begun by the emperor Charles V. in 1537, when he had hoped to fix his court at Granada: it is a square building, each front being 220 feet in length; and though it is roofless, so mild is the climate, that the marble staircases appear as fresh as if they were just completed. Fine as the prospect is from the Alhambra, a still finer is enjoyed from the Generalife on the opposite hill, which was the residence of the court during the heats of summer. The rooms are all floored with marble, and have streams of pure water running through them; a luxury which the Spaniards of Granada, in imitation of their Moorish ancestors, are fond of introducing into their houses. Most of these have fountains in the inner courts, with awnings around them, where the inhabitants in hot weather take their repasts and receive visits. Granada is an archiepiscopal see: it has an university, now dwindled into insignificance; forty-one convents, various churches, thirteen hospitals, many remains of Moorish magnificence, and a bazar called Alcanteria. Its rich territory bears, in perfection, all the products peculiar to the south of Europe. In the stately cathedral are the tombs of Ferdinand the Catholic and his queen Isabella; also that of the renowned warrior Gonsalvo de Cordova. Granada is in lat. 37. 15. N., long. 3. 35. W.

Granada, New, an extensive territory of South America, which comprised all the western part of the new republic of Colombia from the great river Marañon, or Amazona, to the Caribbean Sea; this part of the western hemisphere was first explored by Ojeda and Amerigo Vespucci, in 1508, and became completely subdued to Spanish rule under a captain general, in 1547. In 1718 it was formed into a viceroyalty; restored to a captain generalship in 1724; but in 1740, the viceroyalty was re-established and continued until 1816. In December 1819, an union was effected with Venezuela into one republic, under the name of Colombia, (which see).

Granard, a neat town of Ireland, in the county of Longford, 16 m. E. N. E. of Longford. Pop. in 1820, 2,534.

Granby, a township of Essex Co. Vt. Pop. 97. Also a p.t. Hampshire Co. Mass. Pop. 1,064. Also a p.t. Hartford Co. Conn. Pop. 2,730. Also a p.t. Oswego Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,423. Also a village in Lexington District South Carolina, seated on the Congaree, on the contrary side to Columbia, about a m. below that city. It is noted for a curious bridge, whose centre arch is 100 feet wide, to give passage for large trees which are brought down by the floods.

Grand Island, in Niagara River, N. Y. is about 6 m. long and 3 broad. It has a good soil and is generally covered with trees.

Grand Isle, a county of Vermont consisting mostly of the islands in Lake Champlain, Pop. 3,698. North Hero is the capital. There is a village of the same name in this county.

Grand Lick, p.v. Campbell Co. Kentucky.
Grandmont, a town of France, in the department of Upper Vienne. Near it was a celebrated abbey, suppressed in 1769, after the death of the then professed members. It is 15 m. N. N. E. of Limoges.

Grand Menan, an island at the entrance of the bay of Fundy, the S. end of which is in lat. 44. 43. N., and 67. of W. long.; it is included in the province of Nova Scotia.

Grandpre, a town of France, in the department of Ardennes, seated on the Ayre, 32 m. E. of Rheims.

Grand View, a township of Washington Co. Ohio.

Grangemouth, a village of Scotland, in Stirling-shire, at the junction of the Great Canal with the river Carron, 4 m. N. E. of Falkirk, in which parish it is included. Upwards of 40,000 tons of shipping are annually entered here, belonging either to the foreign or coasting trade.

Granger, a county of East Tennessee. Pop. 1,066. Rutledge is the chief town. Also towns in Cuyahoga and Medina Cos. Ohio.

Grantee, a town of Brandenburg, in the Middle Mark, 30 m. N. of Berlin.

Gratis, a village in Preble Co. Ohio.

Gratz, a fortified town of Germany, capital of Lower Styria, and a bishop's see. Here are many churches, and a fine arsenal. The castle stands on a rock, and is a strong place. Gratz is seated on the W. side of the Muer, over which is a bridge to an extensive suburb. The inhabitants are estimated at 35,000. In 1797 it was taken by the French. It is 88 m. S. S. W. of Vienna. Long. 15. 26. E., lat. 47. 4. N.

Gratzen, a town of Prussian Poland, on the E. bank of the Vistula, 18 m. N. of Culm, and 55 S. of Dantzic. Pop. about 8,000.

Grave, a strong town of Dutch Brabant, on the left bank of the Maese, beyond which there is a fort. It has been often taken. It is 8 m. S. S. W. of Nimeguen.

Grave Creek, p.v. Ohio Co. Va.

Gravelines, a small sea-port of France, seated at the mouth of the Aa, defended by Fort Phillip, 12 m. E. of Calais. Pop. 2,570.

Gravenau, or Grayenau, a town of Bavaria, in the principality of Passau, on the river Sag. 16 m. N. of Passau.

Gravenuert, a town of Bavaria, in the upper palatinate, 17 m. N. of Amberg.

Gravesande, a town of South Holland, where the ancient counts of Holland formerly resided. It is about 4 m. from the sea, and 6 W. by S. of Delft.

Gravesend, a town in Kent, Eng. It stands on the S. bank of the Thames, and is the common landing and embarking place for seamen and passengers to and from London; and here all outward bound vessels stop to be examined by the custom-house officers, and to receive their clearances: and inward vessels deliver in their manifests, it being the boundary of the port of London. A great part of it was burnt down, with the church, in 1727; the latter was rebuilt as one of the 50 new churches. It is called the corporation of Gravesend and Milton, these two places being united under the government of a mayor. The latter place is a m. E. of the other, and has a blockhouse over against Tilbury fort. They were incorporated by queen Elizabeth; but, long before, Richard II. had granted them the exclusive privilege of conveying passengers to London in boats. Gravesend is famous for asparagus and other vegetables, with which most of the ships outward bound on long voyages supply themselves; and the chief employment of the labouring people is the spinning of hemp, to make nets and ropes. It is 22 m. E. S. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,814, and of Milton 2,769.

Gravina, a town of Naples, in Terra di Bari, 32 m. W. S. W. of Bari. It has nine churches and a Pop. of about 9,000.

Gray, a town of France in the department of Upper Saone. It has a trade in iron, and is seated on the Saone, 25 m. N. E. of Dijon. It is the seat of a prefect. Pop. 6,584.

Gray, p.t. Cumberland Co. Me. Pop. 1,575.

Grayson, an interior county of Kentucky, bounded on the S. by Green river. Pop. 3,879. Litchfield is the chief town. Also a county of the Western District of Virginia, bordering on North Carolina; it is intersected by New River which runs from S. to N. into the Ohio. Pop. 7,675.

Greasley, a village 7 m. N. W. of Nottingham, Eng.

Great Britain, an island on the western coast of Europe, comprising England, Wales and Scotland. This island and the neighbouring one of Ireland constitute one kingdom called the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The island of Great Britain is the largest in Europe: its extreme length is about 580 miles: in the south it is 370 miles broad; at the centre 80: and near the centre of Scotland 180. It is situated between 49. 57. and 58. 43. north latitude, and between 35. and 8. 34. west longitude from Paris. Its surface contains 11,400 leagues. Its eastern and southern shores are less deeply indented than the western: they are consequently bolder. There are no islands upon the eastern coast, and upon the southern none except that of Wight and two others of inconsiderable size: on the west are those of Sicily elsewhere described, Anglesey, Man, Arran, Ila, Jura, Mull, Tiry, Egg, Rum, Sky, the Hebrides and Orkneys. In the south the largest bay is that of Exeter. In the east are, beginning at the south, the sandy bay of the Thames; the Wash, where the little stream called the Glen meets the sea; the frith which receives the Humber; the friths of Forth, Murray and Dornoch. On the western coast are the friths of Clyde and Solway; the bays of Morecambe and Arlech, and the Bristol Channel, which receives the Severn.

The mountains of this island compose three groups: the first toward the north is formed by the highlands of Caithness and Inverness; of this group the Orkneys, the Hebrides, Sky and Mull are the extremities. The second consists of the Grampian Hills and some other eminences which terminate at the friths of Forth and Clyde: The third comprises the Cheviot Hills and the broken surface of Wales and the south part of the island. The first group does not rise above 2,500 feet: the highest eminence in the second attains to 4,370, and in the third a few summits rise to 2,500 and 3,000 feet.

There are no basins of great extent. The hills of Caithness, and the Grampian chain form the one most northerly: the most considerable and rapid river of this basin is the Spey which flows with a swift course, and with much obstruction from cataracts into Murray Frith. The southern ramifications of the Grampians form with the Cheviots an extensive basin through which flows the Forth: this river in a course of 60 leagues traverses an extent of meadows, forests, and fertile plains, and its waters abound in excellent fish. The Moorlands and a few other hills surround the vast basin of the Ouse, which under the name of Ure rises in the valley of Wensley, flows to Aysgarth, where it forms a beautiful cascade, takes the name of Ouse after receiving the Swale, and the name of Humber upon joining the Ocean. The ridge which forms the southern limit of this basin, bounds on the north that of the most important river of Great Britain, the Thames. The basins of the southern face of the island are too small to give rise to any considerable stream. Those on the western face are of small extent except that traversed by the Severn: this basin is formed by the highest mountains of England and Wales: the Severn rises at the foot of Plinlimmon and runs into the Bristol Channel. The basin of the Clyde in Scotland, is narrow, but worthy of notice for the beautiful falls of this river, one of which near Stone Syres is 84 feet perpendicular. The region watered by this stream is one of the most romantic, fertile, and populous in the whole country.

The lakes of Great Britain are small; the largest in England is Loch Lomond 30 m. long and 8 wide. Its beautiful banks are much frequented in summer. It embosoms several islands, and its waters are subject to violent agitations without any apparent cause. In Scotland are many lakes, the most noted of which is Loch Lomond, 30 m. long and two to three wide.

The rigors of winter, and the heats of summer, are much less felt in Great Britain than on the continent under the same parallel. The winds from the sea, temper seasons the most opposite, but the variations of temperature are sudden and frequent. If the northern regions are favorable to the growth of vegetables, the state of the atmosphere is often an obstacle to their maturity: rains destroy the too early expectation of a plentiful crop. Moreover, in the north there are wide tracts of barren territory, and on the eastern coast, sand and marshes oppose an obstacle to fertility. The most fertile districts are in the centre and south.

The most useful plants and animals have been imported from the continent at different periods into the British Islands. At the most ancient period, England was covered with virgin forests like the wilds of America: the food of the inhabitants consisted of acorns, apples, nuts and berries: bears, wolves, and wild boars ranged undisturbed among these vast solitudes: the deer fed in the woods and the wild bull in the plains. The beasts of prey have disappeared; the deer only is reserved to afford a sport to the rich, and no other of the wild quadrupeds remain but the small tribes which find a shelter in the mountains and forests. A goat is almost a rarity throughout the island, except in Wales, where they approach somewhat to a savage nature: the Welsh take great delight in hunting them; they prefer the he-goats as having the best fat and skin: the horns of this animal are sometimes three feet in length. Most of the domestic animals of Scotland are small, but their flesh is savoury and highly esteemed. The island of Great Britain contained in 1821 a pop. of 14,158, 815. Adding to this the pop. of Ireland which is 6,801,800, gives a total of 20,963,513. for the pop. of the United Kingdom. The total pop. of the British empire throughout the world is estimated at from 140 to 150 millions. The national debt of Great Britain in 1830 was £304,860,188 sterling. The shipping of the kingdom amounts to 2,500, 000 tons. The imports are valued at 43 millions sterling, the exports 57 millions. The yearly manufactures of cotton 20 millions; of woolen 18 millions; of silk 10 millions. The whole amount of property in the British empire is estimated at 4,096 millions sterling.

The geographical position of the British Islands has necessarily raised the commercial power of the United Kingdom to a degree of prosperity beyond anything which antiquity exhibits to us. It has long been customary to compare the naval power of Great Britain to that of Carthage, but nothing will establish the pretended resemblance. Seated upon a continent, Great Britain would never have attained the preponderance she now exercises. If her two great islands formed but one, the same advantages would not have arisen. The extent of her coasts maintains an immense maritime population, and removes the apprehension of any rival in the empire of the seas.

The secret of the English power first began to be understood by Elizabeth. Called to the throne at a period when the religious reformation which marked an important era, as political reformation characterizes the present, had been obstructed in its progress under the short and bloody reign of Mary, this great princess placed herself at the head of the movement which had drawn all minds within its influence. Unjust and cruel towards Mary Stuart, the political difficulties of her situation can hardly palliate the enormity of her crime, but in other respects we cannot too much admire the grandeur of her conceptions. It was she who laid the foundations of the English power: who first despatched ships to circumnavigate the globe, and who, after sending colonies to both Indies, laid the foundation of that company of merchants who rule over nearly an hundred millions of people in the East. Skilful in turning the peculiarities of the English constitution to her advantage, she had the talent to govern despotically without offending the nation, to restore order and economy among the finances, and to give a new impulse to trade and commerce. The accession of James VI, of Scotland, to the English throne, under the name of James I, was attended with the advantage of uniting without violence, two crowns which the common interest should have placed on the same head. His reign was disturbed by plots which ceased only with the Stuarts, but exterior quiet favoured the operations of trade. Charles I, after sundry acts of indecision, weakness, and despotism, died upon a scaffold, before the eyes of a people who had learned by the tragical end of Lady Jane Grey and Mary Stuart, to witness the fall of a crowned head without shuddering. Under the protectorate of Cromwell, the English navy attained to a degree of power and reputation, which earned a title of glory not to be withheld from this cruel and crafty usurper.

Charles II, restored to the throne of his ancestors, confirmed the abolition of the feudal laws, encouraged commerce and agriculture, and founded the Royal Society of London; but his luxuries and pleasures led him into foolish expenses, to meet which he espoused the Infanta of Portugal with the sole desire of enjoying her rich dowry. He sold Dunkirk to France for 25,000 pounds sterling, and compromised the interests of England by joining Louis XIV, in the undertaken to destroy the Dutch power. His despotism and extortions prepared a new revolution, which was accelerated by the pretensions of the Jesuit party, and the distrust of the protestants: victims on both sides fell upon the scaffold, and James II, in the midst of these troubles, forerunners of civil war, succeeded his brother, shocked the prejudices of the nation upon political and religious liberty, and fled from the kingdom at the approach of William of Orange. Enlightened by the experience of the past, the parliament, in decreeing the crown to the son-in-law of James, drew up the celebrated Bill of Rights, which restrained the royal power within its just limits; the two houses retained the management of the public expenses, and the king that of the civil lists. In vain Louis XIV, actuated by his attachment to the catholic religion, generosity towards an unfortunate prince, and hatred of William, placed at the command of James his money, soldiers, and ships: the battles of the Boyne and Aghrim, in which this prince showed neither the courage nor presence of mind so necessary to a king, took away from him the hope of ever reconquering his throne. Finally after a reign of thirteen years, in which, for the maintenance of expensive wars with France, he was obliged to resort to loans, William died, leaving the kingdom burthened with a debt of 48 millions of dollars, or ten times the amount of the debt in 1688.

Anne the daughter of James II, in placing Marlborough at the head of the army, saw the national glory revive in the victories of Blenheim and Ramillies, while the battles of Oudenarde and Malplaquet caused that of Almanza to be forgotten. Under her reign, Newfoundland, Hudson's Bay, Minorca, and Gibraltar, were acknowledged to belong to the English. Conformable to the act of succession, the house of Brunswick furnished, in 1714, a new dynasty to Great Britain. George I. and George II. had to struggle against the bold enterprises of Charles Edward, the grandson of James II. till the battle of Culloden, which, in 1746, overthrew the party of the Pretender, and delivered England from civil war, and the fears of a new revolution. Toward the middle of the reign of George I, the private fortunes of many individuals were ruined by the South Sea scheme, as it happened in France at the same time, from the financial system of Law. The reign of George II, longer and more abounding in important events, witnessed the renewal of that rivalry between Great Britain and France, which had subsequently such important effects upon the political system of Europe. The former consoled herself for the loss of the battle of Fontenoy, and the disasters of the Duke of Cumberland in Flanders, by her successes on the ocean and in India, and by the capture of the island of Goree, and the conquest of Gaudaloupe and Canada.

Under these favourable auspices George III. succeeded to the throne of his grandfather in 1760. Born in England, he possessed a great advantage over his predecessor, and was the idol of the nation. A war which had broken out in 1755, between France and England, was continued for three years longer, and when the former had suffered the loss of her fleets, and the latter so far exhausted her finances as to be no longer able to raise soldiers without difficulty, the treaty of 1763 followed. Great Britain retained Canada, the island of Cape Breton, Dominica, Grenada, Tobago, St. Vincent, and Senegal, but these acquisitions increased her debt tenfold, and the sum now amounted to 134 millions sterling. This was no favourable time for diminishing the taxes, and still less so for increasing them, particularly by imposing burdens upon colonies so important as those of North America, and who required so much forbearance. These colonies had always possessed the right of taxing themselves in their provincial assemblies. The British parliament in 1765, passed an act for collecting stamp-duties in America, but this attempt failing in consequence of the spirited resistance of the Americans, it was renewed in another form by imposing a duty on tea imported from England: the Colonies began reprisals by refusing to make use of any British imports, and the Bostonians threw the tea into the sea. The mother country scorned the medium of concession and took up arms. The colonies assembled in a national congress, declared the country an independent, sovereign state, made preparation for war and placed Washington at the head of the army. Victory, long time undecided, at length inclined to the side of the Americans, and in 1778 France made a treaty with the new confederation, and agreed to defend their cause: this was a declaration of war against England: the struggle was obstinate and bloody, and the successes balanced, as shown by the treaty of peace in 1783 by which Great Britain ceded to France Tobago, the banks of the Senegal, and some districts in the neighborhood of Pondichry, restored her conquests from this power, and her ally, Spain, and abandoned the demolition of Dunkirk. France also gave up her conquests, and the consequence of this treaty was the acknowledgement of the independence of the United States. The events worthy of note in the affairs of England down to the subsequent rupture with France are, abroad, the conquest of half the dominions of Tippoo Saib in India, and at home, the progress of religious toleration, the extension of the privileges of juries in criminal cases to judge not only of the fact, but of the law, and the proposal for the abolition of the slave trade, brought forward by the virtuous Wilberforce, adopted by the commons, and rejected by the lords.

But the principles which gave rise to the French revolution were now proclaimed with enthusiasm in the political societies of Great Britain, and the parliament adopted the bill for the exclusion of foreigners, and prohibited the exportation of corn to France. The latter complained of the violation of the commercial treaty of 1787, but Great Britain dismissed the French ambassador and organized against that power in 1793 the first coalition, of which she herself was the soul, and which was composed of nearly the whole of Europe. The victories of the French broke up this alliance, and rendered France more powerful than ever. England stirred up a second coalition in 1799, but was herself forced into a peace, and the treaty of Amiens was signed in 1802. A new coalition arose under her auspices in 1805, and new victories and new aggrandizements on the side of the French at the expense of their neighbors were the result. In 1807 the fourth English coalition was broken by the treaty of Tilsit. In 1809 a fifth was formed, and ended in the treaty of Vienna by a new acquisition of territory for France. Finally after a perseverance which exhibits in a striking view the power of England, and the immense resources within her reach, the sixth coalition, renewed in 1813, terminated in the fall of the French empire, the restoration of the house of Bourbon, and the treaty of peace concluded at Paris in 1814.

The British constitution, is a piece of mosaic work belonging to different epochs: it is the great charter of Henry I, modified a century later and forced upon the acceptance of king John. It is the charter confirmed with great alterations by Henry III, and sanctioned by Edward I. Its completion is the Declaration of Rights in 1688. It possesses however, the advantage of not impeding the development of any social faculty, of securing every liberty, by the unrestrained exercise of that of the press, and of exalting the character of the subject by placing his life and property under the safeguard of the laws. The king of England joins to the dignity of supreme magistrate, that of head of the church. The former gives him the right of making war and peace, alliances and treaties, raising troops, assembling, proroguing, adjourning, and dissolving parliament, appointing all officers, civil and military, and the chief Ecclesiastical dignitaries, and pardoning or commuting the punishment of criminals: the latter gives him power to convoke national and provincial synods, who under his approbation, established dogmas and discipline. The parliament enjoys the prerogative of proposing laws, but no law has any validity till approved by the king. On the other hand the will of the sovereign or his ministers, and the annual demand for supplies cannot take the shape of a law till under this form they have been sanctioned by the votes of both houses. The king may increase not only the number of peers, but even that of the commons, by authorizing a city to return members to parliament. He arrives at majority at the age of eighteen, and on his accession to the throne must sanction all the laws passed during his minority. Females as well as males possess a hereditary right to the crown. The responsibility of the ministers, not an empty phrase in England, secures the inviolability of the monarch: the ministers are four in number, and independent of one another:—the First Lord of the Treasury, or prime minister, who has under his direction the taxes, the custom house, the stamp office and the post office;—the Secretary of State for foreign affairs;—the Home Secretary, who has the direction of colonial affairs excepting those of the East Indies,—and the Secretary at War whose authority extends over the concerns of India. A council is organized to examine whatever relates to Indian affairs, and another superintending the business of commerce and the colonies, is composed of enlightened individuals who combine among themselves the interests of agriculture, industry and commerce, and study unceasingly the wants and tastes of every people for the purpose of making them in some way subservient to British industry. The House of Commons consists of 658 members, of whom 489 represent England, 24 the principality of Wales, 45 Scotland, and 100 Ireland.

At the present moment Great Britain is approaching a fearful crisis. Her trade is embarrassed, her subjects disaffected, and her political institutions threatened by the example of popular revolt in the neighboring countries. The Whigs have once more come into power, and a ministry preside in the national councils whose avowed and leading object is to effect an essential change in the government. A struggle for life and death has commenced between the popular and aristocratic bodies. The checks and balances which political theorists have been accustomed to consider as a part of the British constitution, have begun to give distinct evidences of their conflicting tendencies; and the hostile operation of discordant elements seems to promise collision and not equilibrium. The whole aspect of affairs is such as to warrant the belief that the present government of Great Britain cannot last.

Greece, a territory of the S. E. extremity of Europe, and 2,000 years ago the most celebrated portion of that quarter of the globe, it having successfully combated the myriad armies of Persia and the east, and extended its arts and its arms eastward to the banks of the Indus. As the glory of Egypt declined, that of Greece rose to its meridian, to be eclipsed in its turn by the ascendancy of Rome, till in the 15th century it became tributary to the Turks. The main land of Greece extends from the lat. of 36. 25. to 42. N. or about 400 m., and is about 110 in mean breadth. In the days of Grecian celebrity, it was divided into four great parts, viz. Macedonia, Thessaly, Livadia, and the Peloponnesus, exclusive of the island of Candia, and the Archipelago. Under the Turks it was divided into four pachalics, viz. Salonica, Joannina, Egropos or Negropont, and Tripolizza.

It will be proper, before we speak of modern or Independent Greece, first to describe the whole of the country in Europe inhabited by the descendants of the ancient Greeks. This region is a sort of peninsula lying between the Archipelago and the Ionian sea. Its northern boundary is rather indefinite.

Pindus, now Metzova, is probably the nucleus of the mountains in the Greek peninsula; its rocks, forests and poetic fountains have of late given rise to many interesting observations, but its elevation is still unknown. The numerous valleys on its sides are covered with trees; snow falls generally during the month of October on all its summits, and two of them, Dokimi and Peristera, are covered with snow almost the whole year; their height may be vaguely estimated at eight or nine thousand feet. The mountains of Epirus extend to the shores of the sea; Thessaly is encompassed with hills, and forms an amphitheatre on which seventy-five towns were in ancient times built.

Olympus or the modern Lacha is not, according to Xenagoras, more than 5,760 feet; according to Bernouilli it is 6,120 high; its rugged and precipitous rocks give it a picturesque and sublime appearance; the pass of Platamona on the north of Olympus, is encompassed with perpendicular rocks, that rise to the height of 3,000 feet; the famous pass of Thermopylæ is not so imposing, but neither can vie with the one in the ancient Megaris, between the Scironion rocks and the Salonic gulf. Dark and steep rocks hang above the sea, the waves resound beneath their base, the traveller walks along a narrow path near these precipices, and appears suspended between the ocean and the sky.

The erect and steep summits of the ancient Parnassus or the present Liakoura are very lofty, but although they have been seen by many travellers, they have been measured by none. The middle districts of the Peloponnesus form an elevated ridge, and several mountainous groups arise from it; of these Culmos or the ancient Cyllene is said to be the highest central point, and Cape Matapan or the ancient Ténarus, which extends farthest to the south, forms the southern extremity of the European continent.

The coasts of Albania descend gradually towards the gulf of Drino, and rise suddenly near the entrance of the Adriatic. Rocks are heaped above rocks, their summits reach to the clouds, their sides are rent by lightning, the sea which washes them is always tempestuous, and the shores are covered with the wrecks of vessels. Such are the Acroceraunian mountains, so much dreaded by the ancients; they are now better known by the name of the Monte de Chimera.

The coasts of the Ionian islands are for the most part very steep, the calcareous rocks of Leucade rise from the bottom of a deep and stormy sea; they were the cause of much alarm to mariners in the time of Æneas and Ulysses, they are considered dangerous even in the present day.

The island of Candia or Crete is supposed to be a continuation of the mountainous districts which extend along Greece and the Peloponnesus, and the Cyclades are said to be the scattered fragments of two small chains, the one of which extends from Athens, the other from Eubœa;

thus, as we remove from Hemus, the range becomes gradually irregular, or terminates in detached hills and abrupt rocks; the marks of those changes and revolutions which have altered the surface of our globe are apparent in the south of Greece.

It has been maintained that there are some very high mountains in the Archipelago, a learned Greek physician declares that the summits of the mountains in the island of Andros are covered all the year with snow. If that statement were correct, it might be concluded that the most elevated points in the whole of Greece are situated in that island; philosophers might expect to find there the remains of an immense volcano, an Etna that has been extinguished for ages. So extraordinary a fact requires to be confirmed by better evidence before it can be generally believed; the author may have perhaps confounded these mountains with others in Eubœa.

The vale of Tempe extends from the south-west to the north-east, its length is about forty stadia or a league and a half; its breadth, although in general a stadium and a half, is in one place not more than a hundred feet. The calm streams of the Peneus water the valley under the shade of poplars or plane trees, near rocks overspread with ivy, and green and fertile hills; several verdant and beautiful islands have been discovered on the river, but its banks are suddenly contracted, rocks are confusedly heaped on rocks, and its streams are precipitated with a loud noise across a narrow pass, but beyond it the waters resume their tranquil course, and mingle with the sea.

The following tradition was very generally believed in ancient times; the Peneus, it is said, having at one period no outlet, formed a great lake, which covered a part of Thessaly, particularly the Pelasgic plain to the south of Larissa. The valley of Tempe was opened by an earthquake, the lake flowed into the sea, and the dry land gradually appeared. The inhabitants of that region instituted a festival to commemorate an event by which the face of their country had been changed. Theophrastus having observed that the climate of Thessaly was colder in his time, attributes it to the artificial channels, by means of which the stagnant waters had been drained; some of the poets corroborate that opinion, and claim for Hercules the glory of having opened a passage for the Peneus. According to some authors, the deluge in the time of Deucalion extended over the whole earth; it is more generally supposed to have been a partial inundation of Thessaly, which lasted three months; it may be accounted for by admitting that the channel of the Peneus was blocked either by an earthquake during which some rocks were overturned and thus formed an effectual barrier for its course, or by excessive rains, which occasioned a sudden and extraordinary augmentation of its waters.

The cave of Trophonius, a long time the abode of superstition, is still to be seen in Bœtia, and that of Corycius is situated to the north of Delphi; although very deep, almost the whole of it is illumined by the light of day; it is so large that all the inhabitants of Delphi went to it for shelter during the invasion of Xerxes. Every part in the neighbourhood of Mount Parnassus abounds in caverns, which were held in great veneration by the common people; it has been supposed that mephitical vapours issued from the spiracles near the celebrated cave of the oracle, above which the pythoness sat on the sacred tripod; the natural effect of the exhalations was to occasion convulsions and those ecstasies which have accompanied in every age the gift of prophecy.

Greece is situated between two seas, and is not for that reason exposed to excessive droughts; but the cold is often more intense than in Italy or Spain, and the cause is owing to its being on two sides with the great range of the continent, the temperature of which in equal parallels is always lower towards the centre, and also to its proximity to two great mountainous chains, Hæmus and Taurus.

The temperature of Greece varies greatly in different districts, it has been said that the climates of all the regions in Europe are concentrated in that country; the waters of the Danube and the Hebrus are frozen in winter; the Russians who crossed Mount Hæmus had recourse to their furs to protect them against the cold; but on the other hand, spring and summer are the only seasons on the coast of Attica. "The notes of the nightingale are heard in verdant plains where the cold of winter is unknown, and rude blasts never felt; the branches of fruit trees encircled with ivy or the tendrils of the vine shelter these vallies from the burning rays of the sun. Bacchus and his joyous votaries wander in the groves; the narcissus and the glittering crocus, which adorn the wreaths of the gods are always in flower. Venus and the muses meet on the magic banks of the Cephissus; its winding streams, flowing through a thousand channels, water fertile meads." Sophocles.

The traveller, after having crossed the heights of Thermopylæ, enters into Greece Proper; the climate is more oppressive, water is scarcer, but the soil is fruitful; oil is the most valuable production in the southern provinces, and that of Attica is superior to every other, but a thick hoarfrost rises occasionally from the Archipelago and is destructive to plants; it falls in the form of dew and penetrates into the roots and sap, the leaves become yellow, the flowers decay, or if they ripen, the fruit is of little use. The oil exported annually from Attica was calculated to be worth 300,000 piasters; that from the Morea about 400,000. Corinth is still famed for its raisins, Arcadia for its cheese, and Mount Hymettus for its honey. The soil of Attica is covered with aromatic plants, and that circumstance enables us to account for the excellence of its honey; it is sweeter than that of other countries, retains its aromatic fragrance, and, although of a red colour, is perfectly transparent. The same country might rival Spain in the fineness of its wool; the goat thrives on its hills, the uncultivated lands are over-run with thyme, serpillum and marjoram, the Albanian shepherds lead their flocks in summer to these pastures. The breed of goats was improved in the time of the Byzantine emperors by the mixture of the African and Asiatic race, but it has not since been sufficiently crossed; the breed of sheep in Livadia and Arcadia is the best, that of Attica the worst.

The view from Mount Parnassus is extensive, a traveller saw from it Olympus, the Ionian Islands and the Cyclades; he might have observed beneath him the town and gulf of Lepanto, and on the east amidst flowery meads, the populous town of Livadia in the province of the same name.

Corinth, its two gulfs and rocky isthmus, which so many sovereigns have in vain endeavored to cut, still command the entrance into the Peloponnesus or Morea, which has been styled by the Slavonic tribes who penetrated into it during the Byzantine empire, the maritime country. We observe in that region the agreeable town of Argos and Napoli de Romania, or as it is sometimes called the Gibraltar of Greece. Three hundred vessels may ride at anchor in its harbour. Napoli de Malvoisia and its great inland bay, the populous town of Misitra on the valley of the Eurotas, the present Vasili-Potamo or royal river and Tripolitza, where a pacha resided with impunity near the ruins of Mantinea. The towns on the south-west coast are Calamata on the fruitful plains of Messenia, Navarino which still retains its admirable harbour, Gastouni towards the west in the fertile fields of Elis; but Patras, a place of greater trade than any of them contains 8,000 souls. Maga-Spileon, a convent partly cut in a rock, the gloomy lake of Stymphali and many other places renowned in history are situated in the interior of that rich peninsula, of which the produce in corn, grapes, figs, wine, oil, cotton, silk and many other articles amounted to fifteen millions of piasters.

The Greeks, who wander among the ruins of their ancient glory, have at last shaken off the Turkish yoke; heroic deeds both on land and sea, convinced every one that they had awaked from their long lethargy, but as in ancient times, their efforts have been enfeebled by internal discord; the modern Greeks have unfortunately inherited the vanity, inconstancy and treachery of their fathers. Nature has not denied them high intellectual endowments; poets and orators are born amongst them, but their natural abilities are not improved by cultivation: sarcasm and railery supersede argument, and in their deliberations, a frivolous expression, a single word or gesture is sufficient to make them unmindful of their most important interests. The Moraites are less volatile than the townsmen of Romelia, and better fitted to enjoy the blessings of freedom under a good government. The Athenians have not lost their ancient urbanity, their accent is more harmonious than any other in Greece, their language is less diffuse, and for that reason more energetic. Their appearance is nearly the same as that of their ancestors, the women of Athens are still distinguished by their light figures, the oval form of the face, the regular contour, the straight line that marks the profile, full black eyes, high forehead, red lips, small hands and feet; they are equally graceful in the mournful dance of Ariadne and in the rapid mazes of the Romaika. The simplicity of the ancient dress is in some degree retained; a white tunic descends from the neck and a white mantle covers the arms and falls over the shoulders, a handkerchief tied loosely round the head does not conceal their jet-black hair; but the barbarous empire is typified in a clumsy and ill-placed girdle, red trowsers and a heavy Turkish cloak.

The Greek revolution broke out in 1821, and a National Congress assembled at Epidaurus the same year. On the 1st of January, 1822, this Congress published a constitution for the Greek nation. From this period a bloody and devastating war was waged against them by the Turks for a period of seven years. At length the governments of Russia, France and Great Britain interfered. The Turkish marine was annihilated at the battle of Navarino, a French army occupied the Morea, and Greece became an independent state under the protection of the three powers in 1829.

Independent Greece comprises the Morea and the territory without the Isthmus, bounded on the north by a line beginning at the mouth of the river Aspropotamus, the ancient Achelous, and passing up the south-eastern bank of that river to Angelo Castron. Thence it passes through the lakes Sacarovista and Vrachori, to mount Artolera and thence along the valley of Calouri, and the top of mount Ceta to the gulf of Zeitoun. The western Sporades and Cyclades are also included; the whole forming a territory about double the extent of the state of Massachusetts, and containing a population of 650,000. The government in its present state is provisional and experimental. During the war it was elective and republican, but the three protecting powers have recently made attempts to establish a monarchy in Greece. The Prince of Saxe-Coburg was offered the crown but declined it.

Greenland, a country in the N. E. part of America, extending probably to the pole. It was discovered in the tenth century, by the Norwegians, who planted a colony on the eastern coast; and the intercourse between this colony and Denmark was continued till the beginning of the 15th century: in that century, by the gradual increase of the arctic ice, the colony became completely imprisoned by the frozen ocean; while on the W. a range of mountains and plains, covered with perpetual ice, precluded all access. This settlement contained several churches and monasteries, and is said to have extended about 200 miles in the S. E. extremity. In more recent times the western coast washed by the waters of Davis' Straits and Baffin's Bay, was chiefly explored by Davis and other English navigators; but there was no attempt to settle a colony. In 1721, a Norwegian clergyman, named Egede, proceeded to this dreary country, where he continued till 1735, preaching to the natives; and his benevolent example has been since followed by several missionaries. The country is said to be inhabited as far as 76° N. lat. but the Danish and Moravian settlements are chiefly in the S. W. extremity.

This country, in reality, is nothing more than a mass of rocks intermingled with immense blocks of ice, thus forming at once the image of chaos and of winter. Icy Peak, an enormous mass of ice, rises near the mouth of a river, and diffuses such a brilliancy through the air, that it is distinctly perceived at the distance of more than ten leagues. Icicles, and an immense vault, give this edifice of crystal a most magic appearance. An uninterrupted chain of mountains traverses the part of Greenland with which we are acquainted. There are innumerable gulfs, but none of them advance towards the eastern coast. The three points called Stag's Horns, are described at sea at the distance of five-and-twenty leagues. The rocks are rent into fissures, which, in general, are perpendicular, and are rarely more than half a yard in breadth, and contain a great quantity of spar, quartz, talc, and garnets. The rocks are commonly composed of granite, clay slate, and potstone, arranged in vertical beds. The Greenland Museum at Copenhagen has received from this country a very rich mineral of copper ore, schistus of the nature of mica, a coarse marble, and serpentine, together with asbestos, amianthus, crystals, and black schorl. Greenland likewise furnishes us with a new and curious mineral, the fluat of alumina. A vast mine of sea-coal has been discovered in the island of Disco. Three hot springs are the only volcanic indications that have hitherto been observed. During the short season of summer, the air, which is very pure on the mainland, is obscured in the islands by fogs. The flitting glimmer of the aurora borealis, in some degree softens the gloomy horror of the polar night. What has been termed the smoke of ice, is a vapour which rises from the crevices of marine ice. The rare occurrence of rain - the small quantity of snow, and the intense degree of cold produced by the east-north-east wind, lead us to suspect that the most eastern parts of Greenland form a great archipelago, incumbered with perpetual ice, which for many centuries, has been piled together by the winds and currents.

There is some land that admits of cultivation; and probably barley might be made to grow in the southern part of the country. The mountains are covered with moss to the north, but the parts that have a southern exposure produce very good herbs, gooseberries, and other berries, in abundance, and a few little willows and birch. Not far from Julianshaat, is a valley covered with birch; but the tallest of the trees are only eighteen feet high. Near the Danish colonies cabbages and turnips are cultivated.

The most remarkable animal of this region is the White Bear, the largest of his tribe. These animals are sometimes 12 feet in length and are distinguished for their tremendous ferocity. Sometimes they are seen on floating ice out at sea, and are often in this manner conveyed to Iceland. At sea they prey upon fish, seals, and the carcasses of whales. On land they devour deer and other animals, yet they often feed upon berries. In winter they dig themselves dens under the snow or ice and sleep till the sun appears in spring. Among the animal kingdom we also meet with large hares, which are excellent eating, and afford a good fur; rein-deer of the American variety, great numbers of foxes, and large dogs, that howl instead of barking, and are employed by the Greenlanders in drawing their sledges. An immense number of aquatic birds live near the rivers, which abound with salmon.

Turbots and small herrings swarm in every direction in the sea. The natives have been supplied with nets, and now begin to experience their utility. In north or west Greenland, the Danes and natives go in companies to the whale-fishing; but this tumultuous, and, to the natives, far from lucrative occupation, spreads vice and misery through this district. The natives of the south confine themselves to hunting the seal. The flesh of this animal is their principal food; its skin furnishes them with dress, and at the same time they construct their boats of it; thread is made of its tendons, and its bladder is converted into bottles; its fat is sometimes used as a substitute for butter, and at other times for tallow; and even the blood itself is considered by the Greenlanders as excellent for making broth; in fact, he cannot possibly comprehend how any one can live without the sea-dog, which, to him, is like the bread-fruit tree to the Otaheitan, or wheat to the inhabitants of Europe.

The Walrus, or Morse, called also the Sea Cow, is very common in these parts. It is much larger than the seal and is generally found in company with that animal. Like the elephant the Walrus has two large ivory tusks in the upper jaw which weigh from 10 to 30 pounds each. They are hunted for their fat, and are sometimes encountered in herds of an hundred. When wounded they become exceedingly furious, and bite the lances of the hunters in pieces with their teeth. When in great numbers they will sometimes attack boats and attempt to overturn them.

The Greenland Company, established at Copenhagen, estimate its annual revenue at 104,000 rix-dollars, (20,000 to 25,000 pounds Sterling;) and the exportations alone have amounted to 50, or 100,000 rix-dollars, without including the produce of the whale fishery. The expenses of the company are estimated at 16,000 pounds Sterling.

The natives are of a very low stature, have long black hair, small eyes, a flat face, and a yellowish brown skin, evidently indicating them to be a branch of the Esquimaux or Samoiedes of America. This connexion is particularly proved by their language, which is also remarkable for the copiousness of its grammatical forms.

The Greenlanders have not preserved any positive trace of a communication with the Scandinavian colony, whose establishments they invaded and destroyed. The sun, they consider to be a deified female, and the moon, a man, conformably with the belief of the Goths, which differed from that of the other Scandinavians; but as we find a God called Lumus, or Mes, among even the classical nations themselves, this analogy either proves too much or nothing. As to ourselves, we have, on the contrary, recognized in the Greenlanders, a crowd of characteristic circumstances, which demonstrate his connexion with the Esquimaux, even with those that live at the remotest distances from them. The fishing implements employed by the inhabitants of Russian America, among others, are made exactly like those of the Greenlanders. Both of these people, too, make use of the bladder of the sea-dog, distended with wind, and attached to the javelin with which they strike the whale, in order that it may thus serve to prevent the animal, when once he is wounded, from remaining any length of time plunged under water. A similar invention observed both at the eastern and western extremity of North America, must lead us unavoidably to infer that an habitual communication is kept up between those distant tribes. The little boats used by the inhabitants of Oonalaska, in Prince William's inlet, (the Tchougatchian Gulf of the Russians,) by the Esquimaux of Labrador and the Greenlanders, are all precisely of the same construction, and resemble a box formed of slight branches and covered on every side with the skin of the sea-dog. They are twelve feet long, but only a foot and a half wide. In the middle of the upper surface there is a hole surrounded by a wooden hoop, with a skin attached to it, which admits of being drawn together like a purse, by means of a thong. It is in this hole that the rower places himself. Supplied with a single oar, which is very thin, three or four feet long, and becoming broader at the two sides, the navigator, or to speak more correctly, the man-fish, paddling rapidly to the right and left, advances in a straight line across the foaming waves in the midst of the tempest itself, without incurring more risk than the whales and phocæ of whom he is become the companion and rival. This invention, which was admired by Captain Cook, and is adopted in part by the Norwegian and Danish pilots, could not possibly have made its appearance by mere chance under exactly the same form, among all the tribes of the northern extremities of America. These tribes consequently, must have the same common descent, and must long have communicated together.

The present character of the Greenlanders is an indefinable mixture of good and bad qualities; while their attachments to their national customs, opposes the influence of foreign civilization. The Greenlanders bitterly accuse the Danes and other navigators of having brought among them the double scourge of small-pox and spirituous liquors. The present well regulated Danish administration follows a plan of colonization calculated for establishing order and happiness; but the ancient defects and modern vices of the Greenlanders present great obstacles to the system. Almost entirely destitute of every idea of religion and of law, our religious worship appears in their eyes, nothing but a useless ceremony, while they look upon our criminal punishments as an unjust abuse of power. The malefactor appears to them to be sufficiently punished, when in a public assembly, he is loaded with reproaches. The missionaries confess that the conversion of the Greenlanders advances slowly, and exerts but little influence over their moral ideas. For some years back however, the preaching of natives educated as missionaries, has been productive of a happy change. The Moravians have also succeeded in a remarkable manner in engaging the affections, and reforming the conduct of this simple people, who are gifted with considerable quickness of perception. The commercial administration, by introducing numerical calculation, and even paper money, have given them new notions with regard to property. In the southern part of the country, they have been taught to make barrels and construct boats. The name of their ancient divinity, Torngarsook, to whom they never offered any worship, is already forgotten as well as the malevolent goddess without a name, who was supposed to inhabit a palace at the bottom of the sea, guarded by terrific sea-dogs. Even a kind of philosophy has introduced itself among them, and various new opinions exist concerning a future state and the transmigration of souls. The freethinkers of Greenland will not admit the prevalent belief that there is a paradise, where the soul in a state of happy indolence, is nourished with the heads of sea-dogs. The priests and sorcerers, called Angkok, and the malevolent enchanters denominated Ilisets, are daily losing their influence. Perhaps the period may not be far distant, when the sublime devotion of the virtuous Egede will meet with its reward, and a Christian and civilized people will at length inhabit this memorable colony, the most northern that the Europeans have ever established. A mild and pure glory will then recompense Denmark for the pecuniary sacrifices which this struggle with the elements has cost her, a struggle into which she has been drawn by a pious zeal, and the influence of historical recollections.

Greenlaw, a town of Scotland, capital of Berwickshire, though a small place. Here are the remains of two religious houses. It is seated on the Blackadder, 8 m. S. W. of Dunse, and 36 S. E. of Edinburgh.

Green Mountains, a branch of the Apalachian chain in Vermont, extending through the state from N. to S. In the southern part they constitute a single range, but toward the centre of the state they divide into two branches and pass off separately into Canada. The eastern slope of the mountains is watered by the tributaries of the Connecticut, and the western slope by the streams falling into Lake Champlain. The highest point is Killington Peak, near Rutland, 3,924 feet above the sea. Camel's Rump, between Montpelier and Burlington, and Mansfield Mountain in the same neighbourhood, are each above 3,500 feet high. Throughout the state these mountains are from 10 to 15 miles in breadth. They are every where intersected with valleys, abounding in springs and streams, and exhibiting that perpetual verdure which has conferred upon them their name. Their sides are completely covered with woods, and their rocky summits are clad in a coat of green moss. The trees appear old, but small; they are all of the evergreen sort, pine, spruce, hemlock and fir, intermixed with shrubs and bushes. Vegetation decreases on approaching the top of the mountains; the trees diminish in size, and frequently terminate in a shrubbery of spruce and hemlock, two or three feet high, with branches so interwoven as to prevent all passage through them. Trees of this height with shrubs and vines producing berries, and a species of weed called winter grass, mixed with the moss of rocks, are all the vegetation which the mountains produce. The sides of the mountains are generally rugged and irregular; some of them have large apertures and caves. The thick, green moss which coats their tops, is so compact and firm, and lies in such extensive beds, as to reach from rock to rock, and they will sometimes bear the weight of a man without being broken through. These immense spongy masses receive the moisture supplied by the clouds and rain, and while a part of it runs down the sides of the mountain, much of it is absorbed, and penetrates the whole mass. In this manner, several of these mountains are continually wet on their tops, and have large marshy spots, which are the constant resort of water fowl during the warm season. The roads across them are frequently wet and miry, when the valleys below are dry.

The mountains exhibit but few rocky or sterile tracts, and afford generally excellent pasturage for sheep and cattle.

Greenock, the chief sea-port of Scotland, in Renfrewshire, at the mouth of the Clyde, with a small fort for the defence of the harbour. Here are several dry docks, and the building and rigging of ships is much followed. It has a great trade; and the fisheries, particularly for herrings, and the Newfoundland fishery, are carried on to a great extent. In 1801 the number of inhabitants was 17,458, and in 1821, 22,088. It is 24 miles W. by N. of Glasgow, of which it is the port. Long. 4. 47. W., lat. 55. 56. N.

Greenwich, formerly a district town, but now an appendage to the British metropolis. It is seated in the county of Kent, on the S. bank of the Thames, 5 m. below London Bridge. It is celebrated for its hospital for wounded and decayed seamen of the national marine, which is one of the finest architectural edifices in the world. The buildings consists of four distinct piles, two along the bank of the river, with a noble terrace in front 860 feet in length; between these two piles is a lawn 270 feet wide; the two other piles are built behind, projecting into the square or lawn, so as to form a quadrangle with an opening in the centre, which is terminated by an elegant building more recently erected for a naval school; behind this on the summit of a hill, is the royal observatory, from whence the English mariners reckon their longitude: a beautiful colonnade adjoins the buildings in the interior of the quadrangle, and immediately contiguous is a spacious park most beautifully undulated and planted with trees, affording the most delightful promenades and interesting prospects, whilst the liberality and economy of the establishment is in every way worthy of the celebrity it has acquired, and the interest inspired by the beauty and magnificence of the edifice and its surrounding objects. Here was once a royal palace, in which Edward VI. died, and queen Mary and queen Elizabeth were born: it has been long pulled down, and on part of its site now stands the house belonging to the ranger of the park. Here is a college, for the maintenance of 20 decayed housekeepers; and another called Queen Elizabeth college. In 1799, the chapel of the hospital, the dining-hall, and eight wards were destroyed by fire; but the whole were soon rebuilt. The town is irregularly built, and with the exception of the church, which is a noble structure, and the hospital, has nothing to recommend it to particular notice. Since 1820, one or two new churches have been built, and the town generally has undergone some improvement. Pop. in 1801, 14,339, and in 1821, 20,712. See Blackheath, and Deptford. The observatory is in the lat. of 50. 29. N.

Grenada, an island in the West Indies, the last of the Windward Caribbees, and 30 leagues N. W. of Tobago. It is 20 m. long, and 13 broad, finely wooded, and the soil suited to produce sugar, tobacco, and indigo. It was taken from the French in 1763, confirmed to the English in 1763, taken by the French in 1779, and restored to the English in 1783. In 1795, the French landed some troops, and caused an insurrection in this island, which was not finally quelled till June 1796. St. George is the capital.

Grenadillas, or Grenadines, a cluster of islands in the West Indies, dependent on Grenada, and situate between that island and St. Vincent. They are upwards of 20 in number, most of them fertile, and capable of producing cotton, coffee, indigo, and sugar. The most considerable is Carriacou.

Grenade, a town of France, in the department of Upper Garonne, seated at the junction of the Save with the Garonne, 17 m. N. W. of Toulouse. Pop. 3,925.

Grenoble, a city of France, capital of the department of Isere, and a bishop's see, with a fortified castle. The leather and gloves that are made here are highly esteemed. It is seated on the Isere, over which are two bridges to pass into the part called Perriers, a large street on the side of the river. It is the head quarters of the 7th military division, and seat of the Cour Royale for the department of the Upper Alps, Drome, and Isere; 300 m. S. S. E. of Paris, 60 from Lyons, and 100 due W. of Turin. Pop. in 1822, 23,602.

Gretna-Green, a village of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, near the mouth of the Esk, and on the borders of Cumberland. It has long been famous for the clandestine marriages of fugitive lovers from England, which are usually performed by two illiterate and drunken mechanics in the village, who have no form in the operation, excepting the entry of the name of the parties in a school-boy's copy-book. All their inquiries turn upon the length of the applicant's purse, that they may know how to regulate their demand; as they are not usually nice as to fees, any sum from half-a-crown to 100 guineas will be accepted, provided in all cases it is as much as they can get. It is 10 m. N. of Carlisle.

Greussen, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, on the river Helbe, 15 m. N. of Erfurt.

Grimma, or Grumma, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, with a trade in wool, linen, thread, and flannel, seated on the Mulda, 14 S. E. of Leipzig.

Grimmen, a town of Hither Pomerania, 16 m. S. of Stralsund.

Grimby, a borough in Lincolnshire, Eng. It has a large church, like a cathedral, and a good trade in coal and salt. The harbour, at the mouth of the Humber, has been improved. It is 35 m. N. E. of Lincoln, and 168 N. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 3,064.

Grimsey, a town of Lincoln Co. Upper Canada.

Grindenswald, a village of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern, seated among mountains, at the foot of a celebrated glacier, 5 m. S. E. of Thun.

Grindon, a village of Eng. in that part of Durham called Northamshire, 6 m. S. W. of Berwick. To the S. of it, at a place called Grindon Rigg, are 4 upright stone pillars, funeral monuments of the chieftains slain in a famous victory gained here over the Scots, in 1558, by the earl of Northumberland and his brother.

Grinstead, East, a borough in Sussex, Eng. Here is Sackville college, a large stone building, founded by the duke of Dorset, in 1616, for 24 aged persons of both sexes. It is seated on a hill, 20 m. N. of Lewes, and 29 S. of London. It returns two members to parliament.

Grinton, a mountainous and mineral parish in the north riding of Yorkshire, Eng. comprising the four townships of Grinton, Melbecks, Muker, and Reith, seated near the head waters of the Swale river. Pop. of the parish in 1820, 5,300. Grinton is 8 and Muker about 20 m. W. of Richmond.

Gripenswald, or Grifwald, a town of Hither Pomerania, with a good harbour, and a university. It is seated on the river Rik, which is navigable to the Baltic, 14 m. W. of Walgost, and 22 S. E. of Stralsund.

Grisons, a new canton of Switzerland, bounded on the S. by Milan and Venice, E. and N. by Tyrol, and W. by the cantons of Glaris, Uri, and Tessin. It formerly included the Valteline, and the counties of Chiavenna, and Bormio, now included in the Austrian dominions. The country was formerly divided into three leagues, namely, the Grey League, the League of God's House, and the League of the Ten Jurisdictions: each of them had a distinct internal government, and they were connected as one republic by an annual diet, held alternately at the towns of Coire, Hantz, and Davos. But in 1803, the constitution was changed by the French, and the country made an additional canton of Switzerland. The inhabitants, amounting to about 73,000 are partly Calvinists and partly Catholics; but the former are most numerous. The principal subsistence of the peasantry is by breeding oxen, most of which are sent to Milan. The capital is Coire. The Rhine and the Inn both have their source in the Grisons.

Grodno, the principal town, though not the capital, of Lithuania. It has the appearance of a decayed town, containing a mixture of wretched hovels, falling houses, and ruined palaces, with magnificent gateways, remains of its ancient splendour. A few habitations in good repair, make the contrast more striking. Here is a college and physic garden. In the new palace, built by Augustus III. the diets were sometimes held; particularly the last in 1793, which was compelled, at the point of the bayonet, to consent to the second partition of Poland; and here, in 1795, Stanislaus III. formally resigned his crown. Grodno is now subject to Russia. It is seated partly in a plain, on the river Niemen, and partly on a mountain, 140 m. N. E. of Warsaw. Long. 24. 25. E., lat. 53. 28. N. Pop. about 5,000.

Griswold, a township of New London Co. Conn. on the Thames, 8 m. below Norwich. Pop. 2,212.

Grohnede, a town of Hanover, near which is a monument of stone, erected in memory of a battle fought here in 1421. It is seated on the Weser, 9 m. S. of Hameln.

Groll, a small town of Holland, in Gelderland. A duty is collected here on all merchandise passing through it for Germany. It is seated on the Slink, 20 m. E. by S. of Zutphen.

Grondines, a seignior of Hampshire Co. U. C. on the St. Lawrence, 45 m. above Quebec.

Groningen, the most N. E. province of Holland, bounded on the E. by East Friesland, W. by Friesland, N. by the German Ocean, and S. by Drenthe. It is divided into 2 parts, called Groningen and Omelands. The excellency of this country consists in pastures which feed a great number of large horses.

Groningen, a city of Holland, capital of the province of the same name, with a citadel and university. It is seated on the rivers Hunse and Aa, and has a communication, by a canal, with a bay of the German Ocean, at the distance of 10 m. by which large quantities of butter are exported. The inhabitants are computed at 20,000. It is 96 m. N. E. of Amsterdam. Long. 6. 35. E., lat. 53. 12. N.

Grossa, an island in the gulf of Venice, near the coast of Dalmatia, 25 m. long and 2 broad. Long. 15. 7. E., lat. 44. 18. N.

Grossenhayn, or Hayn, a town of Upper Saxony, in Meissen, with manufactures of cotton and woollen cloths, seated on the Roder, 8 m. N. of Meissen.

Grossetto, a town of Tuscany, in the Siennese, with a castle, situate near the sea; 30 m. S. W. of Sienne.

Grotkau, a town of Silesia, in the district of Neisse. The forests round this town are the joint property of all the inhabitants. It is 16 m. N. N. E. of Neisse, and 30 S. of Breslau.

Grunstadt, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Rhine, county of Leiningen, 22 m. N. N. W. of Spire, and 25 S. of Mentz.

Gruyeres, a town and bailiwick of Switzerland, in the canton of Friburg, with a castle on a hill. It has a great trade in cheese, and is 15 m. S. W. of Friburg.

Grufe, a river of Scotland, which rises in the S. W. angle of Renfrewshire, runs over several precipices into the lower country, falling into the Black Cart, near the town of Paisley.

Guadalazara, an interior province of Spain, forming the N. W. part of the kingdom of New Castile. Superfices 163 square leagues, with a pop in 1810, of 121,115. The chief town of the same name is seated on the banks of the river Henares, 30 m. N. E. of Madrid. It has a woolen manufacture. Pop. about 12,000.

Guadalazara, one of the 15 intendencies or divisions of Mexico, bounded on the W. by the Pacific Ocean. Superfices 73,628 sq. m. with a pop. in 1803 of 630,500. It is intersected by the Santiago river, or Rio Grande. The chief town of the same name is seated on the W. bank of the Santiago, in the lat. of 21. 19. N., 70 m. N. of Chapala, and 275 N. W. of the city of Mexico. Pop. about 20,000.

Guadaloupe, a town of Spain, in Estremadura, with a celebrated convent; seated on a rivulet of the same name, 34 m. E. by N. of Truxillo.

Guadaloupe, one of the Leeward Carribean islands, in the West Indies, between Antigua and Dominica. It is divided into two parts by a strait, called the Salt River. At this place the land on each side is not above 4 m. broad, and by this strait the sea on the N. W. communicates with that on the S. E. The S. W. part is 60 m. long and 24 broad; and the N. E. part is much the same. The soil is exceedingly good, and well watered near the sea, by rivulets which fall from the mountains, and produces large quantities of sugar, cotton, and coffee. On this island is a volcano, called the mountain of Sulphur; and on its E. side are two mouths, which open into a pit of sulphur: the blacks who sell brimstone fetch it from this pit. The French settled on this island in 1635. It was taken by the English in 1759, but restored in 1763; again taken by the English in 1794, but evacuated the next year. The English again took it in 1810; and, in order to allure the Swedes into the late coalition against France, gave them this island. It was, however, by the consent of Sweden, restored to France in 1814. Basseterre, at the S. W. extremity of the island, is the capital. Lat. 16. N., 61. 48. W. long.

Guadalquivir, a river of Spain which rises in the S. part of New Castile, flows through the kingdoms of Jaen, Cordova, and Seville, and enters the bay of Cadiz at San Lucar, after a course of about 300 m.

Guaderrama, a town of Spain, in Old Castile. It has a great trade in cheese, and is seated on the Guadarrama, 25 m. N. W. of Madrid.

Guadiana, a river which rises in New Castile, in Spain, crosses Estremadura into Portugal, and, separating Algarve from Andalusia, enters the bay of Cadiz at Ayamonte.

Guadix, a town of Spain, in Granada, and a bishop's see. It contains three parishes and six convents, and is situated in a rich country, on a river of the same name, 36 m. E. N. E. of Granada.

Guam, the chief of the Ladrone Islands, in the Pacific Ocean, 100 m. in circumference. The Spaniards have a garrison here; but the inhabitants are almost all natives of the country, and reputed to be skilful in building boats. It abounds with excellent fruit, and has several good harbours. Umata is the capital. Long. 143. 15. E., lat. 13. 10. N.

Guamanga, a city of Peru, capital of an interior province of the same name. It is famous for its mines of silver. It is 180 m. E. S. E. of Lima. Long. 74. 5. W., lat. 13. 20. S. The province in 1795 contained 111,559 inhabitants, of whom 75,284 were native Indians, and 29,620 Mestizoes.

Guanahani, or Cat Island, one of the Bahama Islands, the first land of America, discovered by Columbus in 1491, and named by him St. Salvador. See Bahamas.

Guanore, an interior town of Colombia, seated on a branch of the Apure River, 195 m. S. W. of Caracas, and 130 E. of Merida. Pop. estimated at 12,000.

Guanaxuato, a small interior province of Mexico, containing only 6,878 sq. m. but a pop. of 517, 300; it is the most densely populated part of the country, and is considered the most productive mineral district in Mexico. The chief city, of the same name, is seated on the eastern declivity of the Cordilleras, upwards of 6,800 feet above the level of the sea, in the lat. of 21. N., and 101. 55. of W. long., giving a mean distance from the city of Mexico of 190 geographical, or 214 British statute m. Pop. about 40,000, exclusive of about 30,000 more, employed in, or dependant on, the mines in its immediate vicinity.

Guancavelica, an interior province of Peru, E. of the maritime range of the Andes, extending about 190 m. from N. to S. between the lat. of 12. 20. and 14. 30. S., and is about 50 m. in mean breadth; it is thinly populated but has mines of quicksilver. The chief city, of the same name, is seated in an elevated glen of the Andes, in the lat. of 13. 5. S., and 74. 35. of W. long., 170 m. S. E. of Lima.

Guamuco, a town of Peru, capital of a fruitful district of the same name. It is 172 m. N. N. E. of Lima.

Guarco. See Gagneto.

Guarda, a town of Portugal, in Beira, and a bishop's see. It is strong by nature and art, and has a stately cathedral, 138 m. N. E. of Lisbon. Guardafui. See Gardefan.

Guastalla, a fortified town of Italy, capital of a small duchy, included in that of Parma, with an ancient decayed castle. It is seated near the river Po, 19 m. N. E. of Parma.

Guatemala. See Panuco.

Guatemala, a province of South America, having about 400 m. of sea-coast on the shore of the Pacific Ocean, between the lat. of 14. and 17. N., being from 30 to 50 in breadth; it forms part of the chain of territory which connects the two great divisions of the western hemisphere, and was formerly with several other provinces included in the government of Mexico; but, since the subversion of Spanish authority in the western world, it has been formed into an independent republic, by the name of Central America. This republic is bounded N. by Chiapa and Yucatan in Mexico, and the bay of Honduras; E. by the Gulf of Nicaragua and Colombia, and S. and W. by the Pacific Ocean. It contains about 150,000 sq. m. It is divided into 5 states. Guatemala, Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica: these are subdivided into 45 districts.

The name of Guatemala, or more correctly Quauhitemallan, that is to say, the place full of trees, originally belonged to a single district. The Spaniards applied it to a Captain-Generalship, which bore the title of kingdom, and to one single province, comprehended within this kingdom.

The province of Guatemala, properly so called, extends from the confines of Guaxaca to those of Nicaragua, along the Pacific Ocean. The climate in general is hot and moist. The plains are fertile, both in American and European fruit of a delightful flavour. The maize produces 300 for one, as well as the cocoa. Indigo of a superior quality is produced there, and the annatto is cultivated. The forests with which the mountains are covered give shelter and food to animals that are still imperfectly known; and many nondescript shrubs are met with, from which they distil valuable balsams. Many ports on the South Sea afford this province great facility for carrying on an advantageous commerce with Peru, Terra Firma, and New Spain. The coasts abound with fish, but fishing is not followed with any considerable activity. They likewise neglect their silver mines, which are said to be rich; but they collect the sulphur that floats on the surface of several lakes. The whole province is filled with volcanoes, and exceedingly subject to earthquakes.

Guatemala is the capital, and is the see of an archbishop, and the seat of a University. The ancient city was destroyed on the 7th June, 1777, by one of the most tremendous earthquakes of which we have any record. From the 3d of June the agitated sea had risen from its bed; the two volcanoes adjacent to the town appeared to boil; one of them shot out torrents of water, the other, waves of blazing lava. On every side the earth was seen to gape in deep fissures. At length, after five days of unutterable anguish, the abyss opened, and the town, with all its riches, and 8,000 families, was instantly swallowed up, while torrents of mud and sulphur, rushing over the ruins, obliterated forever all vestiges of its former existence. The spot is now indicated by a frightful desert. The new city is built at the distance of four leagues from the site of the old town. We must not omit noticing Amatitan, or the town of letters, so called in consequence of the talent which the Indians, its inhabitants, displayed for carving hieroglyphics on the bark of trees. The district of Socoenuco, of which the chief place is Guaguellan, produces the best cocoa of all America; but very little of it is met with in commerce. In the district of Quasaltenango, very fine alum and sulphur are found. Solola produces the best figs in the kingdom, and a good deal of cotton is spun there. Two volcanoes are met with in the vicinity, the one called Atitan, and the other Solola. The district of Suckitepec, fertile in annatto, is subject to excessive rains.

In the forests very large trees are met with, from which a fragrant odour is diffused, and odorous resin distils. Different varieties of gum, balsam, incense, and dragon's blood are also collected. Canes of a hundred feet long are found, and of such a thickness, that from one knot to another twenty-five pounds of water are contained. The bees of this region make a very liquid honey, which, after becoming acid, is made use of, they say, instead of orange juice. The forests are infested with wild animals, amongst which Alcedo distinguishes the Tapir or Danta. When enraged, the animal shows his teeth like the wild boar, and, it is asserted, cuts through the strongest tree. Its skin is six fingers thick, and when dried, resists every kind of weapon. Very large bears are also met with.

The province of Honduras is very little known. It extends from that of Vera Paz to that of Nicaragua. The first Spanish navigators perceiving a great number of pompions floating down the banks of the river, called it the Coast of Hibueras, that is to say, the Coast of Pompions. The most western part of this province contains the little Spanish towns of Comayagua and of Truzillo. The latter of these has been built near a lake, where floating islands, covered with large trees, move from place to place at the discretion of the wind. Near the river Sibun, caverns have been discovered, or rather immense subterranean galleries, which run under several mountains, and appear to have been hollowed out by ancient currents. The interior of the country is inhabited by a savage and ferocious nation, the Mosquito-Sambos. The coasts, especially near Cape Gracias a Dios, are occupied by another tribe of Indians, whom the English navigators denominate the Coast Mosquitoes.

This appellation originates in the insupportable cloud of mosquitoes, or stinging flies, that here torment the wretched inhabitants, and compel them to pass one part of the year in boats on the river. The Mosquito Indians of the coast, a tribe governed by aristocratic chiefs, do not reckon more than fifteen hundred warriors. We are unacquainted with their notions of religion; but, according to the older voyagers, they divided the year into eighteen months and twenty days; and they termed the months Iolalar, that is to say, a moveable thing,—a very remarkable denomination, because it evidently approaches the word Iol, by which the ancient Scandinavians designated the feast that terminated the year,—a term apparently analogous with wheel or cycle. Similar divisions of the year into eighteen months prevailed among the Aztecs of Mexico. Each month consisted of twenty days, and five complementary days were added at the end of the year, which was denominated Cempohualihuitl, from cempohualli, twenty, and ihuitl, festival. The cazique of these Mosquitoes, who inhabit the coast between Black River and Cape Gracias a Dios, lately sold or transferred that territory to a person of the name of Gregor MacGregor, who had attained some notoriety in the late Colombian struggle for liberty.

According to the respectable testimony of Gomara, and almost all the accounts and maps that have been published, the great lake of Nicaragua, is covered with beautiful and populous islands, amongst which only one contains a volcano, named Omo that always continues burning; it has no outlet towards the South Sea; all its waters descending by the river St. John, in the direction of the North or Atlantic Sea. This river, the scene of Nelson's earliest exploits, forms about thirty fells before it reaches the marshy shores of the sea, where a pestilential air, and Indians distinguished alike for their perfidy of character, and the ferocity of their disposition, fill the most intrepid navigators with alarm. The lake, then, is situated on a plateau, but at what elevation? "The coast of Nicoya," says Dampier, "is low, and covered with shrubs. To reach San Leon de Nicaragua one must walk twenty miles across a flat country, covered with mangroves, pasture land, and plantations of the sugar cane." These remarks of a judicious observer appear to indicate that there is no considerable chain of mountains between the Lake of Nicaragua and the Pacific Ocean. The physical geography of this country is unquestionably possessed of great interest, and yet it is totally neglected.

Among the numerous volcanoes of this country, that of Masaya, three leagues (Castilian) from Granada, and ten from Leon, appears to be the most considerable. Its crater, which is half a league in circumference, and 250 fathoms in depth, ejects neither cinders nor smoke. The matter, which is perpetually boiling within it, diffuses so intense a light through the air that it is visible at the distance of 20 leagues. So much, in fact, does it resemble gold in a state of fusion, that the first Spaniards actually supposed it to be this metal, the object of their anxious search; and stimulated by their avaricious temerity, vainly attempted to seize, with iron hooks, some of this very singular lava.

No mines have as yet been discovered in the province of Nicaragua; but it is fertile in every description of fruit, and abounds in large and small cattle, especially in mules and horses. They also carry on a great trade in cotton, honey, wax, aniseed, sugar, cochineal, cocoa, salt, fish, amber, turpentine, and petroleum, together with different balsams and medicinal drugs. The palm trees grow to a colossal size. Leon, the capital, is situated on the margin of a lake, which empties itself into the Nicaragua. Its inhabitants, rich, voluptuous, and indolent, derive but little advantage from the excellent port of Realejo, formed by a bay of the South Sea.

The province of Costa Rica contains no mines, and hence it has been said that this name has been ironically applied to it; but its extensive forests of building timber, its rich pastures, and picturesque scenery, afford abundant reasons for this appellation. Cattle, and especially hogs, swarm here to an extraordinary degree. In the Gulf of Salinas the muscle yielding purple is caught.

Guatemala declared itself an independent state in 1823. The government bears a close resemblance to that of the United States. The Congress consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The executive are a President and Vice President chosen for 4 years. The government however is little more than nominal, the country having been lately in a perpetual state of turbulence and dissension. The population is about 1,800,000.

Guatemala, city, the capital of the above republic, commonly called Guatemala La Nueva, or New Guatemala, stands on a little stream called the Yacas flowing into the Pacific. It is in lat. 14. 40. N. and long. 91. 25. W. It is handsomely built, with regular streets and many elegant public buildings. It was greatly damaged in 1830 by an earthquake. Previous to that event it contained 40,000 inhabitants.

Guazaca, a province of the chain of territory now forming the republic of Guatemala, comprising about 25,000 square miles, extending from sea to sea. The chief city of the same name is seated on the banks of a river, which falls into the gulf of Mexico, in the lat. of 17. 15. N., and 96. 20. of W. long., 450 m. N. W. of the city of Guatemala.

Guyaquil, one of the 12 provinces of Colombia, according to the division of 1825, bordering on the Pacific Ocean, comprising the S. W. part of the republic. The capital or chief town of the same name, is seated on the W. bank of a river falling into a gulf or bay of the same name, about 20 m. from the sea. Guyaquil is the sea-port of Quito, from which it is distant about 150 m. S. S. W. The surrounding country produces an abundance of the finest cocoa, of which large quantities are exported to all parts of Europe. Lat 2 11. S., W. long. 79. 40. Pop. about 20,000.

Guayra la, or Laguira, a sea-port of Colombia, on the shore of the Caribbean sea, and in the new province of Venezuela. It is in lat. 10. 37. N., and 66. 58. of W. long., 7 m. N. of the city of Leon de Caracas, of which it is the sea-port; it exports large quantities of cocoa to Europe, and mules and cattle to the West India Islands; and although the harbour is inconvenient, the traffic is considerable. Pop. about 6,000.

Guben, a town of Lusatia, capital of a circle of its name, which yields great quantities of excellent red wine. It is seated on the Lubst near its conflux with the Neisse, 24 m. N. E. of Cottbus, and 68 S. E. of Berlin. Pop. about 6,000.

Gudensberg, a town of Germany, in Lower Hesse, 10 m. S. S. W. of Cassel.

Guerande, a town of France, in the department of Lower Loire, with a considerable trade in salt. It is 3 m. from the Atlantic, and 40 W. by N. of Nantes. Pop. 7,252.

Guerche, a town of France in the department of Ille and Vilaine, 20 m. E. S. E. of Rennes. Pop. 3,980.

Gueret, a town of France, capital of the department of Creuse. It is seated on the river Creuse, 35 m. N. E. of Limoges, and 190 S. by W. of Paris. Pop. 4,014.

Guernsey, an island in the English Channel, 35 m. S. W. of Cape la Hague, a promontory of the N. coast of France. It formed part of the dukedom of Normandy; but Henry I. of England, annexed it to Great Britain, to which it has ever since continued an appendage, although the language, dress, manners, and form of government of the ancient Normans still continues. The island is about 36 m. in circumference, well defended by natural rocks; the surface is considerably varied, generally fertile, and breed a considerable number of small cattle. It is divided into 10 parishes, which in 1821 contained an aggregate population of 20,827. St. Peter's port, on the E. side of the island, in lat. 49. 33. N., and 2. 40. of W. long., is the chief place of the island, containing more than one half of the total population. The principal point of intercourse with England is Weymouth, from which it is distant 72 m.

Guernsey, an interior county in the E. part of Ohio, containing about 650 square m. It is intersected by Will's Creek, a branch of the Muskingum. The population, which in 1810 was only 3,651, in 1830 had increased to 18,036. Cambridge, the chief town, in the centre of the county, is 85 m. due E. of Columbus.

Güeta, or Hueta, a town of Spain in New Castile, 52 m. E. by S. of Madrid.

Gütingen, a town of Suabia in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, situate on the Zaber, 20 m. N. of Stuttgart.

Guiana, an extensive territory of South America, comprising the whole country between the two great rivers Amazon and Orinoco, extending W. from the Atlantic Ocean through 16 degrees of long. Prior to the war between England and France, which commenced in 1793, this extensive territory was divided between Portugal, Spain, France, and Holland; the Portuguese claimed the whole country lying N. of the Amazons, to about 1. 40. of N. lat. By a treaty in 1801, a line of demarcation was agreed upon between France and Portugal, this line extended from the island of Carpory in the lat. above mentioned, through about 8 degrees of long. From this line French Guiana, extends along the coast to the Maroni river, in the lat. of 5. 44. N., giving about 300 m. of sea-coast, but westward it is not more than 130 m. wide. Dutch Guiana, next extends along the coast from the river Maroni in 5. 44. of N. lat., and 53. 55. of W. long., to Cape Nassau, in 7. 34. N., and 58. 54. of W. long. giving about 360 m. of sea-coast, and a mean breadth of about 170 m.: and Spanish Guiana comprised the coast from the river Maroni, to the Delta of the Orinoco, and all the country W. of Dutch and French Guiana, as far as the 68 degree of W. long. Portuguese Guiana now forms part of the empire of Brazil. French Guiana surrendered to the English in 1809, but was restored at the peace of 1814; see Cayenne. The Dutch had formed four settlements upon their portion of the territory, viz. Surinam, Berbice, Demarara, and Essequibo, along the banks of four several rivers of those names, which also surrendered to the English during the war. At the peace of 1814, Surinam was restored to the Dutch, and all the rest confirmed to England by treaty. The greater portion of this vast territory is comprised of extensive swamps and low lands of unbounded fertility, of which various kinds of animals, reptiles, and insects, are the chief possessors, the human inhabitants being very limited, except upon the rivers Surinam, and Demarara.

The coast, from its lowness, is subject in many places to inundations; the land, at the distance of several leagues from the sea, is deluged by the tides. The sailor loses sight of the capes or promontories at a short way from the shore; but ships can approach them without danger, for the distance may be ascertained with sufficient accuracy by means of the sounding line. The turbid appearance of the sea is owing to the great quantity of alluvial matter borne down by rivers. The mangrove grows on the low grounds, in which the sea water remains stagnant; several fens or marshes, occasioned by the inundations of rivers, are covered with reeds, that afford shelter to the cayman and different sorts of water fowl. The dry season lasts from the end of July to November, and the rainy season corresponds with the winter months in Europe, but the most violent rains fall sometimes in January and February; the weather is dry and agreeable during the month of March and the beginning of May; this period has, for that reason, been denominated the short summer. The whole of April and the latter part of May are subject to continued rains. The climate of Guiana is not liable to the excessive heat of the East Indies, Senegambia, or the Antilles.

It is well known that the trees which bear fruit during the whole of the year in this country, yield more abundant crops in particular seasons, as the orange, the lemon, the guava, the laurus persea, the sapota, the amiona and others, which grow only in cultivated lands. The trees in the woods and all those in a wild state bear fruit but once a year, and the greater number of them at a season that corresponds with our spring; the most remarkable of these trees are the grenadilla and different species of palms. The mango and other East Indian plants thrive in Guiana, but the fruits of Europe, with the exception of the grape, the fig and pomegranate, are not adapted to the climate. The first European settlers observed in this country three species of the coffee tree, the Coffea guyanensis, Coffea pariculata, and Coffea occidentalis; a fourth kind from Arabia was afterwards added by the colonists. Many aromatic plants were imported by the earlier settlers; the country produces in abundance cloves, cinnamon, and different sorts of pepper. The tree which produces the Cashew nut bears a considerable resemblance to the walnut, and the leaves have nearly the same scent. It bears a sort of apple at the end of which grows the Cashew nut, enclosed in two shells, between which is a native inflammable oil, so caustic as to blister the skin. The kernel has a fine flavour, and is used to give a pleasant taste to chocolate and many products of cookery. The cocoa tree grows spontaneously on the east of the Oyapok; indigo and vanilla are indigenous to the soil; manioc and cassava are considered the best alimentary plants; the potato, the igname, two kinds of millet and the tayove are also very nutritive.

The quadrupeds of Guiana are the same as those of Brazil and Paraguay. M. Bajon states, that the jaguar is smaller in this country than in any other part of America; he adds, that it can bring an ox to the ground, but that it is afraid of man, and never ventures to attack him. Stedman on the other hand observes, that these animals sometimes carry off negro women, and too frequently their children, while they are working in the fields. The cougar, or red tiger of Surinam is less than the jaguar, but resembles it in its habits, and is equally ferocious. The tiger-cat is a very beautiful animal of the same class; it is not much larger than the common cat, and of a yellow colour with annulated black spots; like the rest of its kind, it is lively, mischievous, and untameable. It is evident, from Stedman's account of the jaguaretta, that he supposes it to be different from the jaguar; but this opinion is contrary to the common one and to that of the most celebrated naturalists, who consider the jaguaretta to be the same animal as the jaguar. The ant bear is indigenous to the country; the two species, which are best known are the tamanda and the tamanoir; the former is almost eight feet in length; it attacks the jaguar, and seldom leaves its hold without destroying it. The cancerphagus, or dog-crab, frequents the seashore and uses its feet very dexterously in drawing shell-fish out of their cavities. There are many species of monkeys in Guiana; the guata is, perhaps, the most remarkable from its likeness to man; a fanciful traveller takes notice of a striking resemblance between these animals and Indian old women. The guata has short ears, four fingers on its hands, and five toes on its feet; the extremity of its tail is of a spiral form, and enables it to suspend itself on the branches of trees. Some naturalists maintain that the orang-outang has been observed in Guiana, but this is by no means certain, and many well-informed travellers are of a different opinion. Three species of deer are said to be indigenous to the country, and one of these, (the cariacon,) resembles the roe-buck in size and form. The agouti and paca are considered the best game in Guiana. The cabiai is an amphibious animal armed with strong tusks, and covered with bristles; it has been classed as a species of cavy on account of its not having a tail. The peccary or Mexican hog has an orifice on its back containing a fetid liquor not unlike musk, for which reason it has been called the porcus moschiferus; they go together in herds and sometimes lay waste orchards and cultivated fields. The Indians shoot them with poisoned arrows.

The boa, or, as it is called in the country, the aboma, is a large amphibious snake about forty feet in length, and four or five in circumference; it is indifferent as to its prey, and destroys, when hungry, any animal that comes within its reach; the negroes consider it excellent food, and its fat is converted into oil. The rattle snake and dipsas are the most noxious reptiles in Guiana; the sting of the latter is not always fatal, but it produces fever accompanied with excessive thirst, from which circumstance it has derived its name; Guiana is besides infested with serpents, lizards, and alligators. Waterton the traveller has given us an account of his amusement in riding upon the back of one of these latter animals. Those that have visited Holland and Lower Holstein, may form an imperfect notion of the Dutch and British settlements in Guiana;—a vast plain covered with plantations, or enamelled with a rich verdure, bounded on one side by a dark ridge of impenetrable forests, and watered on the other by the azure billows of the ocean. This garden, between the sea and the desert, is intersected by a great many streams confined by dikes, and separated from each other by excellent roads or navigable canals. Each habitation seems to be a village, from the number of small buildings attached to it, and the natural beauties of the country form a striking contrast with its rich cultivation. The revolted negroes have established several petty republics in the interior; although the inhabitants of these states go naked, they live in abundance. They make their butter from the fat of the palm-tree worm, and extract good oil from the pistachio nut. They are not only skilled in the chase, but are expert fishermen, and acquainted with the art of curing their provisions. Like the Hindoos, they obtain salt from the ashes of the palm-tree: and if a sufficient quantity of that article cannot be procured, they season their food with red pepper. The palm-tree furnishes them with plenty of wine; their fields are covered with rice, manioc, ignames and plantains. The manicole supplies them with all the materials of which their huts are constructed; their cups of gourds are made from the calabash tree, and a sort of net-work woven by an insect, serves them for hats. The nebes or banes, so common in the forests, are converted into cordage.

Guienne, a late province of France, 220 m. long and 85 broad, on the S. W. coast, of which Bordeaux was the capital. It now forms the department of Gironde, Lot and Garonne, Dordogne, Lot, and Aveyron.

Guildford, a borough in Surry, Eng. It is seated on the Wey, on the side of a hill, and had a castle and a palace, now in ruins; here is also part of a monastery, which is still occupied. The summer assizes are alternately held here and at Croydon; but the election of members for the county is always held here. It is a well built town, with two churches, and an elegant town hall. The Wey is navigable to the Thames, and the trade in timber and corn is considerable. It is 23 m. W. S. W. of Croydon, and 29 S. W. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. 3,161.

Guilford, an interior county of North Carolina, a sq. of about 25 m. each way; it is well irrigated by the head waters of Cape Fear river. Pop. 18,735. Greensborough is the chief town.

Guilford, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 655. Also a p.t. Strafford Co. N. H. Pop. 1,827. Also a p.t. of Connecticut, in New Haven county, situate on a bay in Long Island Sound, 17 m. E. by S. of New Haven. Pop. 2,344. Also a p.t. Chenango Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,634. Also townships in Franklin Co. Pa. and Medina Co. Ohio.

Guillac, or Gaillac, a town of France, seated on the N. bank of the river Tarn, in the department of Tarn; it is the seat of a prefect. Pop. 7,310. It is 35 m. N. E. of Toulouse, and 15 W. by S. of Alby.

Guimaraens, a town of Portugal, in Entre Douro e Minho, which has formerly been the residence of its kings. It is divided into the old and new town, the former situate on an eminence surrounded by walls. Here is a manufacture of linen in high estimation. The public buildings are magnificent, and the collegiate church is said to be founded on the ruins of a temple of Ceres. It is 10 m. S. E. of Braga and 25 N. E. of Oporto.

Guinea, Upper, an extensive region of North Africa, comprising about 1,500 m. of sea coast, from Cape Mesurado, in the lat. of 6. 26. N., and 10. 30. of W. long., to the Calabar river, in 4. 10. N., and 6. 42. of E. long., and from thence S. to the equator; of the interior parts of this country either N. or S. very little is known. The coast of Upper Guinea, from Cape Mesurado, to Cape Palmas, a range of 240 m., is called the Grain Coast, from the vast quantity of grains of paradise or Guinea pepper which it was found to produce on first being visited by Europeans; further E. for upwards of 200 m. is called the Tooth or Ivory Coast, from the large quantity of fine elephants teeth which are brought to its markets; eastward of the Ivory Coast to the meridional line, is called the Gold Coast, from the gold dust which is found in its rivers; and eastward of the meridional line is called the Slave Coast, from the extensive traffic in slaves which was formerly carried on from thence by the English, Spaniards, French and Americans, to the West Indies and America. This extensive tract of territory is occupied by various tribes and communities of negroes; the most numerous are the Fantees who occupy the coast from Cape Mesurado to the meridional line; from a long continued intercourse with Europeans, the Fantees have acquired strong trading habits, and among them most of the trading nations of Europe have formed settlements protected by forts. In the rear of the Fantees are the Ashantees, who, although they appear to be one people, live in continued hostility with each other. North of the Ashantees, is a tribe called the Chambas, who are represented as an amiable and industrious people, diligent in the pursuit of agriculture; and it was from this peaceful and social occupation from which the Ashantees were wont to drag the people to the coast as slaves, when that traffic was carried on by the English. The cessation of this traffic seems to be the cause of the revenge of the Ashantees who acted as robbers and drovers to the inhabitants on the coast, their enmity being extended to the English whom they regard as the cause of the cessation; and in 1823 and 1826, they waged for a time successful war against the discipline and skill of the British arms. The principal towns or trading stations on this part of the coast, westward of the meridional line, are Cape Coast Castle, Annamaboe, and Anconah: eastward of the meridional line is the kingdom of Dahomey, the principal town of which, on the coast, is Griwhée, and in the interior Abomey, distant about 90 m. The people of Dahomey are represented as fine looking and industrious, their holds being productive in maize, legumes, and yams, and their pastures well stocked with sheep, goats, and cattle. Great ravages are frequently committed among them by leopards and hyenas, whilst the termes or white ants, insidiously intrude in such vast numbers into the habitations of the people, as to commit the most destructive ravages before resistance can be applied; there have been instances of their devouring an ox in a single night, and persons debilitated by disease are liable to be attacked by them. Another remarkable animal of Dahomey is a bat of enormous size; they suspend themselves in thousands by their claws, to the branches of trees, immediately contiguous to the habitations of the people. Eastward of Dahomey on the banks of a river about 25 m. from the sea, is the town of Ardrah, with a pop. of from 7 to 10,000, which seems an independent or free town under the protection of the Rios, a powerful and numerous people, whose country extends 180 to 300 m. into the interior. The country around Ardrah is represented as exceedingly beautiful and productive in every variety of tropical vegetation; further east is the town of Lagos, the country to the northward of which is inhabited by the Jabobs, a very industrious people, who manufacture great quantities of cotton cloth, and whose country is well cultivated, and rich in all the products of agriculture; east of the Jabobs is the kingdom of Benin, supposed to be very extensive, the capital of the same name is about 40 m. from the coast, the sea-port being Gatto; further east, extending to the 10th degree of longitude, are the kingdoms of Warre, and Old and New Calabar. It was from this part of the coast from whence the most active slave trade was carried on by the English, a people from the interior called the Heebas, being the principal victims, and the town of Bonny the principal market. Since the abandonment of this traffic in slaves by the English, the inhabitants of this coast have directed their attention to agriculture and commerce, and now export large quantities of palm oil, ivory and dye woods. From Old Calabar the coast extends to the south, which is commonly called Lower Guinea.

Guinea, Lower, consists of Biafra, Calbonga, Lopez, Malemba, Loango, Congo, Benguela, &c. &c., it is from this part of the coast, from whence the Brazilians still continue to draw 30 or 40,000 slaves annually. Malemba, in the lat. of 5. 24. S., and 12. 20. of E. long., is represented as having a very salubrious climate, and as affording the most favourable spot on the whole western coast of Africa for the residence of Europeans. Off this coast, N. of the equator, are the islands of Fernando, Po, Princes, and St. Thomas, which also afford favourable situations, from whence to dispense the blessings of civilization and social order. The Pintado, or Guinea Hen, now well known and domesticated in Europe and America, was originally from this country and is still found wild in various parts.

All the rivers are filled with crocodiles, called by some travellers caymans; they are generally 25 feet long, according to Cavazzi; there are some also which never enter the water, but hunt fowls, sheep, and she-goats. In another place, however, he states, that there are lizards which differ very little from crocodiles. Cameleons are found in great numbers, and are considered very venomous. The flying lizard, or palm-rat, a pretty little animal, is an object of religious worship; the rich preserve it with great care, and exhibit it to the adoration of the people, who offer it presents. Frogs and toads are of an enormous size.

Monstrous serpents infest these inhospitable countries. The boa, or boma, in length from 25 to 30 feet, and 5 in thickness, darts from trees upon men and animals, swallowing them at once, and in its turn becomes a prey to the negroes, who attack it during its digestion, or burn it by setting fire to the woods at the termination of the rains. It wages an interminable war against the crocodiles. The bite of another species of serpent is mortal within 24 hours. Travellers who are fond of the marvellous, represent it as blind, and describe it with 2 heads; they mean the amphibians.

The mamba, as thick as a man's thigh, is 20 feet long, and very nimble. It instinctively chases the n'damba, and devours it whole and alive. This last is only an ell long, with a wide and flat head like the viper, and the skin beautifully spotted; its poison is very subtle. The n'dambi, is one of the most venomous; is with difficulty distinguished from the trees themselves, the trunks of which it entwines, lying in wait for its prey. It is reported that the touch only of the lenia, a variegated viper, is followed by death, but that the bite of the animal is its antidote. The country swarms with scorpions and centipedes; the former often creep into houses and books.

The fleas, bugs, and flies of Europe, are not found in Guinea; there are, however, gnats and moschetoos in abundance, which form one of the plagues of the country. The sting of the banzo, of the same size as our gadfly is said to be mortal. Different species of very formidable ants infest both men and animals. Malefactors, who are sometimes bound and exposed to them, are consumed to the bones in one day. The insendi or insongati, enter the trunk of elephants, and cause them to die in extreme madness. The sting of the inzani, which are a black and very large species, produces violent pains for some hours. The salais (ants,) small, round, red, and white, are the most dangerous; they insinuate themselves every where, and destroy linen, merchandise, furniture, and even houses, the wood work of which they hollow out, leaving nothing but an external shell. According to Grandpre, they have the instinct to fill up with clay the stakes which support the houses, to prevent their fall. Fire alone, and marble, can resist their devouring teeth; but furniture may be secured by placing the feet in pans of water.

In a country so infested with noisome and destructive insects, it is pleasant to know that one, at least, of considerable utility exists; it is a scarabæus, of the size of a cockchafer, which contributes essentially to the salubrity of the atmosphere, by making deep holes, and burying in them all impure and corruptible matters under ground; it is the more valuable in consequence of its wonderful fecundity. Numberless swarms of bees wander in the forests, occupying the hollows of trees,—and it is only necessary to drive them away by lighting fires under them, and thus take their honey. Grasshoppers are esteemed as food by the natives, and are not despised even by Europeans.

The ostrich and peacock are esteemed by the negroes. In Angola, the king has reserved the sole privilege of keeping peacocks. There are both brown and red partridges, which have the peculiarity of perching upon trees. The quail, pheasant, thrush, the widow and cardinal birds are found in abundance. The cuckoo differs from ours in its note. The Ocycus indicator, found in every part of the torrid zone, here bears the name of sango. The parrot varies much as to size, colour, and voice. Very different from those we see in cages; strong, nimble, and bold, they fly with great rapidity, and are very formidable to other birds, which they attack, and lacerate most unmercifully in the combat.

The different species of the turtle doves, pigeons, fowls, ducks, and geese of this country are not well distinguished. The idle disposition of the natives has never thought of profiting by the use of the eggs of fowls in domestic economy. The hen, left to herself, deposits her eggs where she pleases, and runs undisturbed about the fields with her chickens in search of food. Among the fisher birds, is the pelican, the puffin, and gulls of every variety. The skin of the pelican, applied to the stomach, is said to restore its vigour.

It is astonishing to behold the immense number of eagles, vultures, falcons, hawks, and other birds of prey, which hover over the woods when set on fire by the negroes, and snatch from the midst of the flames quadrupeds and serpents half roasted. According to the report of travellers, who have given a very superficial account of birds, the number of owls, screech owls, and bats, is also considerable.

Among the quadrupeds, the hippopotamus affords the negroes an agreeable dish; which, on meagre days, is not unacceptable to Europeans.

The wild boar (agalli), of which there are several varieties, is a scourge to the country. The hog, introduced by the Portuguese, is less remarkable for its size than for the goodness of its flesh. The blacks rear a few guinea-pigs. Though originally a native of hot climates, this animal lives and breeds in temperate and cold countries. Its skin is of little value, and the flesh although sometimes eaten, is indifferent food. They are so cleanly that much of their time is spent in licking and smoothing each other's fur. They feed on all sorts of herbs, especially on parslay, which they prefer even to bran, flour or bread. They are also exceedingly fond of apples and fruits. Like the rabbit they eat precipitately; little at a time, but very often. They are very prolific and multiply astonishingly. A single couple will produce one thousand in a year. The use of the horse, the ass, and the mule is a nullity to the negro, who dares not even venture to mount them. Whether negroes or Portuguese, the inhabitants find it preferable to be carried about in hammocks.

Guinea, New, or Papua, an island of the South Pacific Ocean, to the N. of New-Holland, from which it is separated by Endeavour Strait, it is next in size to New-Holland, extending S. E. from the equator, to 12. S. lat., and from 131. to 153. E. long., a length of more than 1,900 miles, by a medial breadth of perhaps 300; but the coasts of the eastern part are far from being completely investigated. The northern part is said to have been discovered by the Spaniards, in 1528, who had sailed from Mexico to explore the Spice Islands. The coasts are generally lofty; and in the interior, mountain rises above mountain; but the whole appears covered with such luxuriance of wood and herbage, as can scarcely be conceived. The cocoa, sago, bread-fruit, and plantain tree, beside most of the trees, shrubs, and plants, common to the islands in the South Pacific Ocean, are found here in great perfection. This island is the chosen residence of the singular birds of paradise, which breed here during the wet monsoon, and in the dry migrate in flocks westward, to the smaller islands, particularly Arroo. Here are also elegant parrots; and pigeons that almost equal a turkey in size. The inhabitants of the northern part are called Papous: whence the name of the country. They seem to have the true Malay complexion and features; but in general are of horrible appearance, and great ferocity. Their language and habitations resemble those of Borneo, &c. On the west the women seem the most industrious in making mats, and pots of clay, which they afterward burn with dry grass or brushwood; and they even wield the axe, while the men are indolent, or engaged in the chase of wild hogs. In the interior is a race called Haraforus, who live in trees, which they ascend by a notched pole, drawing it after them to prevent surprise. On this extensive territory, so favoured by nature, there is no European settlement. The chief commerce is with the Malays and Chinese, from whom they purchase blue and red cloth, axes, knives, and other instruments. Their returns are ambergris, tortoise-shell, small pearls, birds of paradise, and other birds, which the Papuans dry with great skill. Some slaves are also exported, probably captives taken in intestine wars.

Gwalior, a fortress of Hindoostan, in a district of the same name, in the province of Agra, situated on a rock about four miles in length, but narrow, and nearly flat on the top, with sides almost perpendicular, from 200 to 300 feet above the surrounding plain. The rampart conforms to the edge of the precipice all around; and the only entrance is by steps running up the side of the rock, defended on the side next the country by a wall and bastions. The area within is full of noble buildings, reservoirs of water, wells, and cultivated land; so that it is a little district within itself. At the N. W. foot of a mountain is the town which is well built. This fortress is considered as the Gibraltar of the east; but, in 1780, major Popham took it by an unexpected nocturnal escalade, and in 1804, it capitulated after a practicable breach was made through its walls by colonel Henry White. It was afterwards given up to the Mahrattas by lord Cornwallis. It is 80 m. S. of Agra. Long. 78. 28. E., lat. 26. 15. N.

Hamburg, a free and imperial city of Germany, in Lower Saxony, seated on the north bank of the Elbe, about 55 m. from its mouth, consisting of the old and new town; both nearly of an equal size. Most of the houses are built after the manner of the Dutch, and richly furnished within. The principal streets of the old town have long and broad canals, which are filled by the tide. It is seated on the river Elbe and Alster, and the latter, a tributary stream of the Elbe, before it enters the town by sluices, forms a fine basin. Here is a celebrated college, an arsenal, a bank, and a handsome exchange. The established religion is Lutheran, but all denominations are tolerated. Beside the five principal churches, there are eleven smaller ones for particular occasions, some of which belong to hospitals of which there are a great number. It has a library containing about 100,000 volumes. The cathedral of Our Lady is a very fine structure. The city is well fortified, and on the ramparts are handsome walks, planted with rows of trees. On the east is the suburb of St. George, and on the west the Hamburger Berg. Hamburg, from its situation, has all possible advantages for foreign and domestic trade; particularly from its communication, by the Elbe, with some of the principal navigable rivers of Germany; and hence it is one of the most commercial places in Europe. The number of vessels that frequent its port is about 2,000. It is distinguished for its sugar-refinery, and it has manufactures of cotton stockings, gold and silver lace, silk, linen, handkerchiefs, sail-cloths, thread, ribands, and velvets. The commerce however, received a severe shock in 1806; and since that the city itself has been almost reduced to ruin. Previous to the year 1806, this city became the depot of all the continental commerce, and numbers of merchants flocked here from every part of Europe, bringing their property along with them, as to a place free from military away, and secure from the warlike commotions which then agitated Europe; but after the defeat of the Prussians at the battle of Jena, the French took possession of it, and afterwards annexed it to the empire. In 1813, on the advance of the Russians into Germany, the French evacuated the town, and the Russians immediately entered. In May following, the French laid siege to it for more than a month, when the Russians finding it impossible to defend it any longer, retired. The French, on re-entering, began to strengthen the fortification; and after the battle of Leipzig, the commander, marshal Davoust, hearing of the approach of the allies, made preparations for a long siege. For this purpose he destroyed the suburbs and gardens; and expelled all the inhabitants who were not able to provide provisions for six months. On the restoration of the Bourbons, however, the French garrison was withdrawn, and the place delivered up to the allies in May, 1814; since which it has recovered its former independence and activity. This city suffered much from the pestilential cholera in the autumn of 1831. It is 55 m. N. E. of Bremen, and 40 S. W. of Lubeck. Pop. about 115,000. Lat. 53. 84., long. 9. 58.

Hampshire, a maritime county of England, bounded on the N. by Berkshire, E. by Surry and Sussex, S. by the English Channel, W. by Dorsetshire and Wiltshire. It is nearly square, except a projection on the S. W.; is divided into 39 small hundreds, and 253 parishes; and has one city, Winchester, and 20 market towns. It sends, with the Isle of Wight, 26 members to Parliament. This county has a great variety of soils, but the principal part is chalk. The Dorsetshire border has large tracts of heath; and toward the sea are great quantities of marsh land, but very fertile; and all the remainder is excellent land. It is one of the most fertile and populous counties in England. On the downs, of which a ridge runs almost across the county, are fed plenty of sheep: but the stock is considerably decreased, owing to enclosures. Besides wheat, barley, and hops, it is famous for bacon, honey, and timber; the last in particular, on account of its great woods, of which the principal are the New Forest, and the Forest of Bere. The principal rivers are the Avon, Test, Itchen, and Stour. The principal harbours, of which there are a great number along the coast, are Portsmouth and Yarmouth. Southampton is deemed the county-town, but the assizes are held at Winchester. See New Forest and Wight.

Hanover, a territory in the N. of Germany, bounded on the N. E. by the river Elbe, N. W. by the German Ocean, S. W. by Dutch Friesland and Prussian Westphalia, and S. E. by Saxony. Since 1815 it has been divided into the provinces of Calenberg, Göttingen, Lüneburg, Hoya and Diepholtz, Hildesheim, Osnaburg, Verden, Duchy of Bremen, Bentheim, East Friesland, Lingen, and the lordship of Meppen. The chief towns are, Hanover the capital, Embsen, Hildesheim, Lüneburg, Osnaburg, Göttingen, Zell, Clausthal, Goslar, Einbeck, and Hameln. In the S. is the mountainous tract of the Harz, covered with forests, and with the exception of which the whole country is a vast plain. (See article Hartz). Towards the N. are numerous barren heaths; but the valleys in the S. are very fertile. This country abounds in extensive mines of silver, iron, copper and lead. The iron mines are the most valuable, and bring annually to the revenue about £115,000 sterling. The principal rivers are, the Elbe, the Weser, and the Embs with their tributary streams, and the chief lakes, Steinheim and Dummer.

The corn cultivated is much the same as in Britain. The extensive heaths of Lüneburg produce honey annually to the amount of £40,000. The chief manufactures are thread, linen, woollens, paper, and glass. The exports are linen, iron, copper, timber, horses, and black cattle. The imports are linen, broadcloth, silk and jewelry.

The revenue of Hanover is about £1,000,000. The prevailing religion is the Lutheran; but all denominations are tolerated. The Catholics amount to 150,000, and the Calvinists to 40,000. In every village elementary schools are established, and in more populous places academies, or high schools, which are well conducted, as well as the university of Göttingen. The frankness, simplicity and hospitality, mentioned by Tacitus as characteristic of the ancient Germans, is still a prominent feature in the manners of the Hanoverians, particularly the inhabitants of the heaths.

Hanover, though under the government of Great Britain for more than a century, has undergone no political incorporation. At the diet of Germany, the king of Hanover occupies the fifth rank, and has four votes at the general assembly. The king's power is limited, having a counterpoise in the nobility of Wolfenbützel, the heads of the church and the deputies of the towns. The only order of knighthood, is that of the Guelph, instituted in 1815.

Hanover was taken possession of by the king of Prussia in 1801, and invaded by Bonaparte in 1803, and in 1806 partly ceded to the Prussians. But on the expulsion of the French in 1813, the whole electorate was restored to the king of Great Britain; and the electoral office having been annulled, he assumed, in 1815, the title of king of Hanover. Population of the whole territory about 1,300,000, of whom about 8,000 are Jews.

Hanover, a city of Germany, and capital of the above kingdom. It is built in the form of a half moon, and divided by the river Leine into the old and new town. The old town presents an antiquated appearance, but the buildings in the new town are in a better style. Hanover contains a considerable number of public buildings, among which are the elector's palace, and the public library; the latter founded by Leibnitz, to whom an elegant monument has been erected in the town. There are five Lutheran churches, besides the chapels of the Calvinists and Catholics, and a Jewish synagogue. There are small manufactures of gold and silver lace, printing of cotton, linen, brewing, vinegar, &c. Pop. 25,000. 41 m. W. by N. Brunswick, and 154 W. of Berlin.

Han-see. See Tusen.

Hanse Towns, the name of certain free towns of Germany, which, being infested with pirates and robbers, entered into a mutual league for their protection. This association is supposed to have continued from the 13th to the 16th century. It consisted at first of only two towns, but it so increased in strength and reputation, that at last it consisted of 66 cities. Having at length proclaimed war against Woldemar, king of Denmark, with 40 ships and 12,000 troops, several merchants were ordered by the princes of their respective kingdoms, to withdraw their effects, and the association for the most part was dissolved. Several towns in Germany still retain the name, though the laws by which they are governed are annulled.

Pop. 9,789. It is handsomely built and contains many fine public edifices, among which are a Gothic church, much admired for its architecture; a state house, a deaf and dumb asylum, a retreat for the insane, and a seminary called Washington College. This institution was founded in 1826. It has 9 instructors and 70 students. Its libraries have 6,200 volumes. It has 3 vacations in April, August and December, of 11 weeks. Commencement is in August. Hartford enjoys a considerable commerce with Boston, New York and the southern cities. The bookselling trade is carried on here extensively, and there is much inland traffic with the towns on the Connecticut and in the neighbourhood. On the opposite bank of the river is East Hartford which is connected with the city by a bridge. The inhabitants point out to the stranger an ancient oak tree in the southern part of the city which bears the name of the Charter Oak, from the following circumstance. In 1686 Sir Edmund Andros was sent by James II. to seize the charters of the New-England colonies. On arriving at Hartford he convened the legislature and declared his mission. Delays were practised till evening, when the instrument was brought into the hall and laid upon the table, but before Andros could lay his hand upon it, a signal was given and all the lights were immediately overturned. When they were re-lighted the charter was no-where to be found. It had been secretly conveyed away and hidden in the tree above mentioned, where it remained safely till the deposition of Andros and the accession of King William III.

The houses are elegant, built of stone, and there are 11 churches richly ornamented, 2 hospitals, a dock-yard, lazaretto, and other public buildings. The harbour is capable of containing upwards of 1,000 vessels, and the entrance which is so narrow that only one ship can enter at a time, is defended by two strong forts, called the Moro and the Puntal; there are also many other forts and platforms, well furnished with artillery. A citadel of great strength is erected near the centre of the town, which contains the captain general's palace, and where the treasure is deposited. Here all the ships that come from the Spanish settlements rendezvous on their return to Spain. This city was taken by the English in 1762, but restored to the Spaniards in 1763. It is seated on the W. side of the harbour, and watered by two branches of the river. This town exceeds, in point of commerce, every other town in Spanish America. Pop. about 70,000. Lat. of fort Moro, 23. 9., long. 82. 15.

tains three parish churches, and has a considerable trade, and sends one member to parliament. The assizes and county gaol are kept here; and it had once a wall and castle, now in ruins, the latter built in the reign of Stephen. It is seated on the Cleddaw, which is navigable for vessels of small burden as high as the bridge, and which soon after enters a creek of Milford haven, 15 m. E. S. E. of St. David, and 263 W. by N. of London. Long. 5. 0. W., lat. 51. 50. N.

Haverhill, p.t. Grafton Co. N. H. on the Connecticut, 35 m. N. W. of Dartmouth College. Pop. 2,153.

Haverhill, p.t. Essex Co. Mass. on the Merrimack, 12 m. above Newburyport. Pop. 3,912. This is a pleasantly situated town and has considerable ship building and trade by the river. It was settled in 1640 and suffered much in the early Indian wars. In 1698 the Indians attacked and set fire to the town. A troop of them approached the house of a Mr. Dustan, who at that time was abroad in the fields. He flew to the house, which contained his wife and eight children. He directed the children to escape as fast as possible while he attempted to save his wife who was sick in bed. Before this could be done, the savages were at hand. He flew to the door, mounted his horse, seized his gun and hastened away with his children. The Indians pursued and fired upon them, but Dustan returned the fire and keeping himself in the rear of his troop of little ones held the savages at bay till he had retreated to a place of safety. Mrs. Dustan with her infant, six days old and their nurse, fell into the hands of the Indians.

The child was soon dashed against a tree and killed. The Indians divided into several parties for subsistence; and Mrs. Dustan and her nurse, and a boy taken from Worcester, fell to the lot of a family of twelve, with whom they travelled through the wilderness to an island at the mouth of Contocook river, in the town of Boscawen, N. H. where they encamped for the night. Just before daylight, finding the whole company in a profound sleep, she arose and armed herself and companions with the Indian tomahawks, which they wielded with such destructive effect, that ten of the twelve were instantly despatched; one woman escaping, whom they thought they had killed, and a favourite boy was designedly left. They took the scalps of the conquered enemy, and taking a canoe for their own use, and cutting holes in one or more that were left, to prevent pursuit, they descended the river, and arrived home in safety. She received a reward of 50 pounds from the treasury of the colony. The place whence they were taken, is about one m. north of the town; it is still owned by her descendants, and part of the house is still standing.

Hebrides, or Western Islands, a large cluster of islands, situated in the Atlantic Ocean, on the W. coast of Scotland, extending from the lat. of 55. 17. N., to 58. 29. They are upwards of 300 in number, and contain about 2,000,000 acres. The chief of these are, Lewis and its circumjacent islands, belonging to Rossire; Harris, N. and S. Uist, Benbecular, St. Kilda, Bara, Sky, Raasa and Egg, attached to Inverness-shire; Cana, Rum, Muck, Coll, Tirey, Mull, Jura, Colonsay, Isla, Gighu, and Cara, belonging to Argyleshire; and Bute, Arran, Greater and Less Cambray, and Inchermock, which compose the shire of Bute. The ancient history of the Hebrides is connected with much uncertainty. They were governed by independent princes of their own, until the destruction of the Picts, by Kenneth II., and for several centuries were the resort of pirates; and their chieftains were long lawless and seditious, till they were at last brought under the controul of the royal power. The influence of the independent chieftains of the Western Isles was completely destroyed by the act of parliament in 1748, which abolished all heritable jurisdictions. About 86 are inhabited, and are computed to contain about 70,000 inhabitants.

Hebrides, New, islands in the South Pacific Ocean, lying between 14. 29. and 20. 4. S. lat., and 168. 41. and 170. 21. E. long. They were discovered by Quiros, in 1606, and considered as part of a southern continent, under the name of Tierra Australia del Espiritu Santo. Bougainville visited them in 1768, and found that the land was not connected but composed of islands, which he called the Great Cyclades. Cook, in 1774, ascertained the extent and situation of the whole group and gave them the name they now bear. The principal islands are Tierra del Espiritu Santo, and Mallicollo, beside several of less note, some of which are from 18 to 25 leagues in circuit. In general they are high and mountainous, abounding with wood, water, and the usual productions of the tropical islands. The inhabitants are of very different appearances at different islands, but are chiefly of a slender make and dark colour, and most of them have frizzled hair. Their canoes and houses are small, and poorly constructed; and except their arms, they have scarcely any manufacture, not even for clothing. They are, however, hospitable and good-natured, when not prompted to a contrary conduct by the jealousy which the unusual appearance of European visitors may be supposed to excite.

Hebron, a town of Syria, in Palestine, with a Christian church, said to contain the tombs of Abraham and Sarah, to which the Mahometans, as well as Christians, come on pilgrimage. Constantine built a church here, the walls of which are still standing. It is 25 m. S. of Jerusalem.

Heidelberg, a city of Germany, in the circle of Lower Rhine, with a celebrated university. It has manufactures of woolen stuffs, carpets, silk stockings, velvet, and soap. It was the capital of the palatinate, and celebrated for a great tun, which held 800 hogheads. The city has undergone so many calamities by war and fire, that it is not so large as formerly. The protestant electoral house becoming extinct in 1693, a bloody war ensued, in which the castle was ruined, and the elector removed his residence to Mannheim. The French took possession of this town in 1800, and in 1803 it was given to the elector of Baden. It is seated on the Neckar, over which is a bridge, 12 m. S. E. of Mannheim, and 52 S. of Frankfort. Pop. about 10,000.

Heidelberg, a town of Germany, in Lower Rhine, 17 m. S. of Heidelberg. Pop. about 1,800.

Heiligenstadt, a town of Lower Saxony, capital of the territory of Eichfeld, with a castle and a college. It is seated at the conflux of the Geisland with the Leine, 17 m. S. E. of Göttingen.

Helisberg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Ermeland. In 1703 Charles XII. of Sweden fixed his head-quarters here. It is seated on the Alla, 45 m. S. of Konigsberg.

Helder, a town of North Holland, with a strong fort which defends the entrance of the Texel. In September, 1799, the fort was taken by the English, and the whole of the Dutch fleet lying in the Texel surrendered to them, for the service of the prince of Orange; but the English abandoned the fort in November following. It is situated on the N. W. point of the province, opposite the W. end of Texel island, 24 m. N. of Alcaer, and 45 N. by W. of Amsterdam. Long. 4. 34. E., lat. 53. 0. N.

Helena, p.v. Phillips Co. Arkansas.

Helena, St. an island in the Atlantic Ocean, 27 m. in circuit, belonging to the English East India Company. It lies between the continents of Africa and South America, about 1,900 m. W. of the former, and 1,600 E. of the latter; and was discovered by the Portuguese, in 1501, on St. Helena's day. Afterward the Dutch were in possession of it till 1600, when they were expelled by the English. In 1673 the Dutch retook it by surprise; but it was soon after recovered. It has some high mountains, particularly one called Diana Peak, which is covered with wood to the very top. There are other hills also, which bear evident marks of a volcanic origin, and some have huge rocks of lava, and a kind of half vitrified flags. The climate of St. Helena is temperate, being exempted from the extremes of heat and cold, from thunder and lightning and hurricanes. It is moist, however, and only about one day in three is illumined by sunshine. The interior valleys and little hills are covered with verdure, and interspersed with gardens, orchards, and various plantations. There are also many pastures, surrounded by inclosures of stone and filled with a fine breed of small cattle, and with English sheep; goats and poultry are likewise numerous. The inhabitants do not exceed 3,000, including nearly 500 soldiers, and 1,600 blacks, who are supplied with corn and manufactures by the Company's ships in return for refreshments. The town, called James-town, is small, situated at the bottom of a bay on the S. side of the island, between two steep, dreary mountains. The principal street is well built and contains about 30 houses, at the top of which two other streets branch off to the east and west. In the latter are the barracks, the hospital, and several shops, stored with every kind of commodities. On the left side of the parade are situated the government-house and the main guard-room, in the former of which the governor and public officers reside. The church is situated in front of the gateway, by which the town is entered, and near it there is a small theatre. St. Helena is particularly celebrated for having been the prison of Napoleon, the late emperor of France, and for being the place in which he breathed his last, and where his mortal remains are deposited. He died in May, 1821. Lat. of James-town, 16. 55. S., long. 5. 43.

Helena, St. one of a cluster of islands on the coast of S. Carolina, composing the parish of St. Helena, in the district of Beaufort. Pop. 8,799

Helens, St. a village in Hampshire, Eng. at the E. end of the Isle of Wight, 2 m. N. E. of Brading. It has a bay or road of considerable note as a rendezvous for ships that are outward bound.

Helms, St. a village in Lancashire, Eng. 3 m. N. E. of Prescott. In and near it are a variety of manufactures; particularly an extensive copper-work, and a still larger one at Ravenhead, for casting plate-glass. The Sankey canal begins at the coal mines here, and takes a circuitous course by Newton to the Mersey, below Warrington.

Helier, St. the capital of the island of Jersey, seated on the E. side of the bay of St. Aubin, with a harbour and a stone pier. It has of late rapidly increased from a small village to a respectable town. The inhabitants are computed to be 10,000, and have manufactures of woollen, stockings, and caps. At the top of the market-place is the statue of George II.; and in the church, where prayers are read alternately in English and French, is a monument to the memory of major Pierson, who fell here in the moment of victory. Besides the church there are chapels for dissenters. There are three gazettes published weekly in French, and one in English. Long. 1. 58. W., lat. 49. 11. N. See Jersey.

Helier, St. a little island near the town of the same name, in the bay of St. Aubin, on the S. side of Jersey. It took its name from Elerius, or Helier, a holy man who lived in this island, and was slain by the Pagan Normans. His cell, with the stone bed, is still shown among the rocks; and in memory of him, a noble abbey was founded here. On the site of this abbey now stands Elizabeth castle, the residence of the governor, and garrison of Jersey. It occupies the whole island, which is near a mile in circuit, and is surrounded by the sea at every half flood; and hence, at low water, is a passage to the town of St. Helier, called the Bridge, half a mile long, formed of sand and stones.

Heligoland, or Helgoland, a group of small islands in the German Ocean, off the coast of Denmark, to which they formerly belonged; but now to Great Britain. They are situated about 98 m. from the Weser, the Elbe, and the Eyder. The principal island which is divided into the Cliff and Lowland, is about 2 m. and a half in circumference, and on it is erected a light-house, which is visible nearly 30 m. distant. Heligoland has two good harbours, and to the east of the smaller island, called the Downs, is good anchorage in 48 feet of water. The number of inhabitants is about 2,000 who live chiefly by fishing and acting as pilots. Lat. of the light-house, 54. 11. N., long. 7. 55.

Helipolis, or Midras, a village of Egypt, 4 m. E. N. E. of Cairo, where the French gained a decisive victory over the Turks in 1800. Here is a celebrated spring of fresh water, said to be the only one in Egypt; and, according to tradition the Holy Family came here on their flight from Herod, and bathed the child Jesus in this fountain.

Its situation was long doubtful till 1711, when something of this city was discovered by a peasant digging a well in his garden; and from 1738 to the present time, researches being frequently made by digging, a great number of manuscript, paintings, statues, busts, domestic utensils, instruments of husbandry, &c. have been found. The village of Portici now stands on part of its site. It is 5 m. E. by S. of Naples. See Pompeii.

Hercyna, a river of Greece in Bœotia, with two streams, the larger called by the ancient Lethe, and the smaller Mnemosyne.

Herefordshire, a county of England, bordering on Wales, and bounded on the N. by Shropshire, E. by Worcestershire, S. by Monmouthshire, and Gloucestershire, and W. by the counties of Brecknock and Radnor. It contains 556,400 acres, and is divided into 11 hundreds and 221 parishes. It has one city, Hereford, and 7 market towns, Leominster, Ross, Weobly, Ledbury, Kington, Bromyard, and Pembridge, and sends 8 members to parliament; two for the city of Hereford, and two for the boroughs of Weobly, and Leominster and two for the county. Herefordshire is almost entirely an agricultural county. About nine-tenths of the land are in a state of cultivation, and it excels in almost every department of husbandry. The face of the county is rich and picturesque; the climate is mild and the soil extremely fertile, which arises from the subsoil of limestone on which it rests. Hops are cultivated, and the apples producing the cider, for which Herefordshire is celebrated, grow in greater plenty than in any other country. Red and yellow ochres are often met with. Fuller's earth is dug near Stoke, and on the borders of Gloucestershire iron ore is found. It is watered by several streams, the chief of which are, the Wye, the Munner and the Lug. Before the invasion of the Romans, Herefordshire was inhabited by the Silures, a brave people, who long checked the progress of the Roman arms; but being at last overcome, they retired into the fastnesses of Wales. It was a part of Mercia, one of the kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy. Pop. in 1811, 94,073, and 1821, 103,231.

Hereford, an ancient city, and chief town of Herefordshire, Eng. seated on the N. bank of the Wye, over which there is a stone bridge of six arches. It has manufactures of gloves, flannels, and hats. It was anciently defended by a castle, which is now destroyed, and only part of the walls remain. It has four churches, the principal of which is the cathedral, a large and venerable structure, and there are also several places of worship for dissenters. It has also an infirmary, a county gaol, a house of correction, and a lunatic asylum and a free grammar school. The city is in general well built, the streets wide, and the environs delightful. It sends two members to parliament. Hereford, from its situation on the borders of Wales, suffered much from the wars between that country and England, and in later times, from the contests between the houses of York and Lancaster, and the civil broils in the time of Charles I. It is 135 m. W. N. W. of London, and 30 N. W. of Gloucester. Pop. in 1811, 7,306, and in 1821, 9,090.

Hertford, p.v. Perquimans Co. N. C.

Hertford, an interior county of England, extending in a north-easterly direction, about 32 m. in length, and 16 in mean breadth; bounded on the S. by Middlesex, E. by Essex, N. by Cambridge, and Bedford, and W. by Buckingham and part of Bedford. It contains 337,920 acres, is divided into eight hundreds, 135 parishes, and has 19 market towns, the chief of which are St. Albans, Hertford, Ware, and Royston. It sends six members to parliament, two for the county, and two for each of the two boroughs. The north part is hilly, forming a scattered part of the chalky ridge, which slopes towards London. A number of clear streams take their rise from the S. side. Flint stones are scattered in great profusion over the face of this county; and beds of chalk are frequently to be met with. The soil, however, with the aid of proper culture, is favourable to wheat and barley, which come to as great perfection here as in any part of the kingdom. The W. part is, in general, a tolerable rich soil and under excellent cultivation. The principal rivers are, the Lea, Stort, and Coln, and the artificial one called the New River. The Grand Junction Canal passes through the S. extremity of the county. Corn is the principal object of agriculture, and a great trade in malt is carried on. The manufactures are inconsiderable. Pop. in 1821, 129,714.

Hertford, or Hartford, a borough, and the capital of Hertfordshire, with a market on Saturday. It is seated on the Lea, which is navigable for barges, as it was once for ships. In 879 the Danes erected two forts here, for security of their ships; but Alfred turned the course of the river, so that their vessels were left on dry ground. Edward, the eldest son of Alfred, built a castle here, which has been often a royal residence. The town is governed by a mayor, and had formerly five churches, but now only two. Here is a fine hospital belonging to Christ's hospital in London; also a noble shire hall, and a large county gaol. About a mile to the E. is a basin of water called Chadwell, which is the head spring of the New River, and at the distance of two miles and a half on the London road is the East India College for the education of 100 students. Hertford is 21 m. N. of London. Pop. in 1811 3,900.

That part which forms the northern boundary of India, is a continuation of the same range with that to the west of the Indus, known among the Afghans under the name of Hindoo Coosh. To the east of that river, it increases in height, and assumes a character of additional grandeur, both from that circumstance and from its great extent in every direction. It forms, in fact, one of the sublimest features in the structure of the old continent and of the globe. Here a long range of summits, covered with perpetual snow, presents itself to the Hindoo, who has in all ages raised towards it an eye of religious veneration. All the names by which it is distinguished are derived from the Sanscrit term Hem, signifying snow. Hence have arisen the name Imaus and Emodus among the ancients, and Himmaleh, Himadri, Himachal, and Himalaya, of the moderns. The river Indus passes through a series of narrow defiles in lat. 65. which scarcely offer any interruption to the mountain chain. The direction of the mountain is eastward, as far as the north-east point of the valley of Cashmere: from this point, its direction is to the south-east, extending along the sources of all the rivers which run across the Punjab to fall into the Indus, with the exception of the Sutledge, which, like the Indus itself, rises on the N. side of the range, and takes its passage across its breadth. Pursuing the same direction the Himmaleh mountains cross the heads of the Jumna, the Ganges, and their numerous tributary rivers. Farther east, they seem to be penetrated by several rivers, as the Gonduh, the Arum, the Teesta, and Coai, and the Burrampooter. The geography of the countries to the east of this last river is so little known, that it is a question whether the same mountain range is continued any farther. It seems agreed that, if it is continued, its height ceases to be equally great; it is probable, however, that a continuation of it extends along the northern frontier of the provinces of Quang-si and Quang-tong all the way to the Chinese sea, declining gradually as it advances to the east.

The following are the heights of some of the peaks which have been ascertained :

Dhawalagivri, or the White Mountain, near the sources of the Gonduk river, above the level of the sea, . . .	26,862
Jamootri, . . .	25,500
Dhaiboon, seen from Catmandoo, . . .	24,768
Another peak seen from the same capital, . . .	24,625
Another near to the preceding, . . .	23,262
A third in the same vicinity, . . .	23,052
Peak St. George, . . .	22,240

Thus the Himmaleh mountains exceed in elevation the Andes of America; that of Chimborazo, the highest of the latter, not exceeding 21,470 feet above the sea. Through this stupendous chain there are different passes, but all of them laborious to travel, and some highly dangerous. One of the most practicable is that which in its upper part, follows the bed of the river Sutledge. To the east of this, there are some practicable only at a favourable season, and where the traveller still runs the hazard of being caught in a fall of snow, or otherwise perishing with cold. Through the whole mountainous tract, and even before ascending much above the inhabited parts, the traveller is liable to be attacked with an alarming failure of respiration, from the great rarity of the air, an affection attributed by the natives to various fanciful and sometimes superstitious causes. Some of the most difficult passes are occasionally traversed by marauding parties from the one side of the Himmaleh to carry off the property of the inhabitants on the other. Such passes exist between Nepal and Thibet, or that stripe lying close to the north side of the Himmaleh which is inhabited by Bhootees, and may probably come under the name of Bootan, a name of which we are not at present able to assign the exact local extent. Here there are also one or more easier passes chiefly along the beds of the rivers Gonduk, Arum, and Teesta. Hence armies have crossed from Nepal to attack the territory of Thibet, and a Chinese army has in return invaded and subjugated Nepal. The difficulty of access to these regions, heightens the ardour of the admiring Hindoo, actuated in some degree by curiosity, but much more by superstition, to bathe himself in the icy streams which give origin to the Ganges or its mighty tributaries; to contemplate the mystic rock, which so closely resembles the hind quarters of a bullock, and is reputed to have been the result of a holy transmutation of a divine being, a scene where it is reckoned a merit to make a voluntary sacrifice of life, by precipitating the body over the fatal crag. Superstition has in many instances chosen to cherish its propensities in localities signalized as the origin of large and fertilizing rivers. No where is this carried so far as in this mountainous tract, and it must be confessed, that in no locality is the sublime character of the scenery so much in unison with such feelings. In the Hindoo Pantheon, Himmaleh is defined, and is described as the father of the Ganges, and of her sister Ooma, the spouse of the destroying power Siva, the favourite object of propitiatory adoration.

Hinckley, a town in Leicestershire, Eng. It has a large church, with a lofty spire; and had formerly a castle and walls, traces of which are still to be seen. Here is a considerable manufacture of common stockings, thread, and worsted. It is seated on an eminence, 12 m. S. W. of Leicester, and 99 N. N. W. of London.

Hindelopen, a town of the Netherlands, in Friesland, seated on the Zuider Zee, 21 m. S. S. W. of Lewarden.

Hindia, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a country of the same name, in Candeish; situate on the S. bank of the Nerbudda, 90 m. N. E. of Burhampour.

Hindoostan, or India, and by the Aborigines, called Bharatta, a region of Asia, which comprises all the countries between the mountains of Tartary and Thibet on the N., Bootan, Assam, and the bay of Bengal, on the E., the Indian Ocean on the S., and the same ocean and Persia on the W. But this country must be considered under the three grand divisions of Hindoostan Proper, the Deccan, and the Peninsula. Hindoostan Proper includes the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and all those that lie to the N. of the river Nerbudda; the principal of which are Agimere, Agra, Allahabad, Cashmere, Dehli, Guzerat, Lahore, Malwa, Moultan, Oude, and Sindy. The Deccan has been extended to the whole region S. of Hindoostan Proper; but in its most restricted sense, it means only the countries situate between Hindoostan Proper and the river Kistna. See Deccan. The tract S. of the river Kistna, is generally called the Peninsula; although its form does not authorize that appellation: it includes a small part of Golconda, Mysore, and the Carnatic, with Madura, and other smaller districts; the W. coast being called that of Malabar, and the E. that of Coromandel. The sheiks possess Lahore, part of Moultan and Delhi; the king of Candahar, Cashmere, Cabul, Sindy, and part of Moultan; Berar and Orissa, Malwa, Candeish, Visiapour, and part of Agimere and Guzerat, are in the possession of the Mahrattas; and the nizams of the Deccan possess Golconda, part of Dawlatabad and Berar.

The British possessions are Bengal, Bahar, part of Allahabad, and Orissa, the Northern Circars, the Jaghire in the Carnatic, the countries north and south of Calicut, Bombay, and the island of Salsette. The allies of the British are the Rajahs of Mysore, Tanjore, Madura, Travancore, Trichinopoly, the nabobs of Oude and Arcot, and the district of Cochin. The principal rivers are the Ganges, the Indus, Nerbudda, Puddar, Taptee, Caggar, Mahanada, Godavery, Kistna. The chief mountains are the Himmaleh, the western and eastern Ghauts, and those which divide Bengal from Ava. The number of inhabitants is upwards of 100,000,000, of which the greater proportion are idolaters, and are divided into three great sects; the first worship the Triad, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva; the second are the followers of Boodh, whose principal tenet is the doctrine of transmigration; the Jains are the third, who chiefly worship Pariswanath; the other class of inhabitants are Mahometans, of whom there are about the eighth part of the number of Hindoos. To give an idea of the modern revolutions in the empire of Hindoostan, it is proper to observe, that from a pure Hindoo government, it became, at last, a Mahometan state, and continued to be so, under various dynasties, till the beginning of the 18th century. The first irruption of the Mahometans was in the year 1680. From this period the provinces of Hindoostan were held rather as tributary kingdoms, than as provinces of the same empire; and the conquest of the Deccan, in particular, was for ages an object of considerable importance to the emperors. In 1359 the Mogul Tartars, under the conduct of Timur, or Tamerlane, invaded Hindoostan; but the conquest of the country was not effected till 1525, by sultan Baber, one of his descendants, who, from this circumstance, was the founder of the Mongul dynasty; and hence Hindoostan has been called the Mongul Empire, and its chief, the Great Mogul. The illustrious Achar, his son, failed in his attack upon the Deccan; an attempt in which many of his successors were equally unfortunate, and which tended, in the sequel, to the decline and dissolution of the empire. In 1615 emperor Jehangire, his son, received Sir Thomas Roe, as the first English ambassador, and the Portuguese had, by this time, acquired considerable settlements in Bengal and Guzerat. In the reign of his grandson Aurungzebe, which lasted from 1680 to 1707, the empire attained its full extent; his authority reached from 10 to 35 degrees in lat. and nearly as much in long., and his revenue exceeded 32,000,000*l.* sterling. But in the course of 50 years after his death, a succession of weak princes and wicked ministers reduced this astonishing empire to very narrow limits, and deprived it of all its power and splendour. In consequence of the intrigues of the nizam of the Deccan, Nadir Shah, the Persian usurper, invaded Hindoostan in 1738. In the reign of Ahmed Shah, successor of Mahomed Shah, the entire division of the empire took place; nothing remaining to the house of Tamerlane but the city and small territory of Dehli. The last imperial army was defeated by the Rohillas, in 1749. The Jats, a Hindoo tribe, founded a state in Agra; Oude was seized by Mahomed Kooli; and the Mahrattas, beside their ancient domains in the Deccan, obtained great part of Malwa, Guzerat, Berar, and Orissa. The Mongul empire was now become nearly nominal; and the emperors, from this period, must be regarded as of no political consequence, otherwise than as their names and persons were made use of, by different parties, to promote their own views; for the name and person of the emperor retains a considerable degree of veneration among the bulk of the people in Hindoostan. Ahmed was deposed in 1753, and his successor was deposed and murdered in 1760. He was succeeded, however, by his son Shah Ahlum, who was alternately dependent on the contending powers, and more particularly upon the English, who obtained from him a grant of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa, and the Circars. This prince died in 1806, and was succeeded by his second son, Achar Shah. The Mahometans or Musselmans, whom the English improperly call Moors, are represented to be of a detestable character. The Hindoos, or Gentooes, are of a black complexion; their hair is long, their person straight and elegant, and their countenance open and pleasant. They differ materially from all other nations, by being divided into tribes or castes. The four principal tribes are the Brahmins, Soldiers, Labourers, and Mechanics; and these are subdivided into a multiplicity of inferior distinctions. There are Brahmins of various degrees of excellence, who have the care of religion allotted to them, and are held sacred by the rest; some of these acknowledge the errors that have crept into their religion, own one Supreme Being, and laugh at the idolatry of the multitude, but insist upon the necessity of working upon the weaknesses of the vulgar; yet the generality of them are as ignorant as the laity. Such as are not engaged in worldly pursuits are a very superstitious, innocent people, who promote chastity as much as they can, both to man and beast. but those who engage in the world are generally the worst of all the Gentooes; but, persuaded that the waters of the Ganges will purify them from their sins, and being exempt from the utmost rigour of the courts of justice (under the Gentoo governments) they run into much greater excesses. The Soldiers are commonly called Rajahpoots; that is, descended from rajahs. They are much more robust than the rest, have a great share of courage, and a nice sense of military honour, which consists, among them, in fidelity to those they serve. Fighting is their profession; they readily enter into the service of any that will pay them, and will follow wherever he leads; but should their leader fall in the battle, their cause is at an end, and they run off the field without any stain of their reputation. The English East India Company have many battalions of them in their service; they are called Sepoys, and are clothed and disciplined in the European manner. The Labourers include farmers, and all who cultivate the land. The Mechanics include merchants, bankers, and all who follow any trade; these again are subdivided into each profession. Besides these, are the Hallechores, who cannot be called a tribe, being rather the refuse of all the tribes. They are a set of unhappy wretches, who perform all the vilest offices of life, bury the dead, and carry away every thing that is polluted. All the different tribes are kept distinct from each other by insurmountable barriers: they are forbidden to intermarry, to cohabit, to eat with each other, or even to drink out of the same vessel with one of another tribe. Every deviation from these points subjects them to be rejected by their tribe, renders them polluted forever, and obliges them, from that instant, to herd with the Hallechores. The members of each caste adhere invariably to the profession of their forefathers, from generation to generation the same families have followed, and still continue to follow, one uniform manner of life. To this may be ascribed that high degree of perfection conspicuous in many of the Indian manufactures; and also that striking peculiarity in the state of Hindoostan, the permanence of its institutions, and the immutability in the manners of the inhabitants. The Hindoos vie with the Chinese, in respect to the antiquity of their nation. Their institutions of religion form a complete system of superstition, upheld by everything which can excite the reverence of the people. The temples consecrated to their deities are magnificent; their religious ceremonies splendid; and the absolute dominion which the Brahmins have obtained over the minds of the people is supported by the command of the immense revenues with which the liberality of princes, and the zeal of pilgrims and devotees, have enriched their pagodas. The dominion of religion extends to a thousand particulars which, in other countries, are governed by the civil laws, or by taste, custom, and fashion. Their dress, their food, the common intercourses of life, their marriages, and professions, are all under the jurisdiction of religion. The food of the Hindoos is simple, consisting chiefly of rice, ghee (a kind of imperfect butter), milk, vegetables, and oriental spices. The warrior caste may eat of the flesh of goats, sheep, and poultry. Other superior castes may eat poultry and fish; but the inferior castes are prohibited from eating flesh or fish of any kind. Their greatest luxury consists in the use of the richest spices and perfumes, of which the great people are very lavish. They esteem milk the purest of food, because they think it partakes of some of the properties of the nectar of their gods, and because they esteem the cow itself almost as a divinity. Their manners are gentle. They are taught by their religion that matrimony is an indispensable duty in every man who does not entirely separate himself from the world from a principle of devotion; and, as none but male descendants can perform the obsequies to the manes of their ancestors, it is thought an irreparable calamity to die without male issue. Scarcely any state can be more degrading than that of Hindoo females. Till three years after the nuptial age, a girl is entirely at the disposal of her father. When married, she is immured in her husband's dwelling; her dependence upon him is perpetual and entire; she is not permitted to eat in his presence, and is considered not as a companion to aid him in enduring the evils of life, but as a slave to bear children, and be subservient to his rule. Polygamy is tolerated; but females, except among the Nairs, are not permitted to marry a second time. A husband can dismiss his wife at any time; but there is nothing that can dissolve the wife from her matrimonial engagement. The inhuman custom of women burning themselves on the funeral pile of their deceased husbands has however been recently prohibited in the presidencies of Fort William and Madras; and the progress of Christianity affords reason to hope for the speedy abolition of other revolting practices. The code of Gentoo laws, with their sacred books, the Veidam and the Shastah, are written in the Sanscrit language, which is very copious and nervous, although the style of their best authors is wonderfully concise. Hindoostan, towards the N., is pretty temperate, but hot towards the S.; and it rains almost constantly for three months in the year. Its products are diamonds and other precious stones, silks, spices, aromatics, drugs, maize, rice, and sugar; and the chief manufactures muslins and calicoes.

The great forests and marshy districts are peopled with elephants. The tiger is common in Malabar and Bengal and is the scourge of every district he inhabits. The mountain bear is even more terrible than the tiger; he inhabits the Ghauts and is probably a sort of hyena. The common bear is found in the forests of the south. Wolves and jackals are common in the interior parts. The serval or panther cat which inhabits this country is little known. The lynx and caracal inhabit the northern provinces. The rhinoceros seeks amid the mud and water of the marshes a shelter from the scorching heat of the climate. He is a much rarer animal than the elephant, and is never seen in troops like that animal. He never attacks men unless when provoked. Hindoostan swarms with serpents, and almost every river and lake abounds in crocodiles.

Hinzuana, Joanna, or Anjouan, one of the largest of the Comoro Islands, situated off the eastern coast of Africa. It is of a triangular form; and the whole island appears to have undergone the action of a volcano, the rocks being every where volcanized. It is entirely mountainous, but is covered with vegetation, which reaches even to the summit of the highest conical hill. The coasts can be approached with safety. The sovereign of Hinzuana takes the title of sultan, and formerly ruled over the whole group of the Comoro Islands. His subjects view him with the most profound respect, and never approach him without kneeling, and touching the earth with their forehead. The nobles are on a familiar footing with the king, and must be consulted on many occasions. The natives are in general tall, robust, and well made; they have long black hair, piercing eyes, and are of a colour between olive and black. They profess Mahomedism; but the native African worship of fetiches is still very prevalent. They are courteous and hospitable, and all shipwrecked mariners have been received with the greatest kindness. The pine apples are most delicious, and the other fruits are excellent. Yams and sweet potatoes are in abundance; also goats and poultry. The bullocks are of a moderate size, are excellent food. This island is often frequented by Europeans, and particularly by English vessels, for the sake of procuring water and provisions. The commodities in demand are arms, toys, looking-glasses, shirts and blue and red cloth. Saltam is the capital. Long. 41. 30. E., lat. 12. 54. S.

Hio, a town of Sweden, in Gothland, seated on the lake Wetter, 145 m. S. W. of Stockholm.

Hit, a town of Syria, near which is a spring of naphtha and bitumen. It stands on a river of the same name, which soon after joins the Euphrates, 100 m. W. by S. of Bagdad.

Hitchin, a town of Hertfordshire, Eng. with a great trade in malt. It has a handsome parish church, and several meeting-houses. 15 m. N. W. of Hertford, and 34 N. W. of London.

Hiths, or Hythe, a borough in Kent, Eng. It is one of the principal Cinque Ports. Near it are the remains of Saltwood Castle, now turned into a farm house, barns, &c. In consequence of the harbour becoming gradually choked up, the trade declined; and the town itself was almost annihilated by pestilence and famine. At present, however, it is a thriving and respectable place. It is 10 m. W. S. W. of Dover, and 68 S. E. of London.

Hoi-king, a city of China, of the first rank, in Ho-nan. 320 m. S. W. of Peking. Long. 112. 34. E., lat. 35. 6. N.

Hoi-san-foo, a city of China, of the first rank, in Kian-nan. It is seated in a marshy, and inclosed by a triple wall. The suburbs extend to the distance of a league on each side of a canal, and from their extremity a kind of port on the Hoang-ho. The canal, being above the level of the city, occasions perpetual danger of inundation. 515 m. S. S. E. of Peking. Long. 118. 4. E., lat. 53. 30. N.

Hoang-ho, a large river of Asia, also called the Yellow River, from the quantity of clay which it devolves. Its sources are two lakes, situate among the mountains of that part of Tartary known by the name of Kokonor, in about 35. N. lat. It pursues a N. E. direction to about 42. N. lat., and after running due E. it suddenly bends S. penetrating China to a latitude nearly parallel to its source; and then it pursues an easterly direction till it enters the Eastern Ocean, 100 m. to the N. of the mouth of the Kian-hu. The length of its course is estimated at 2,000 m. At 70 m. from the sea, where it is crossed by the great canal, the breadth is little more than a mile; but it is so rapid and shallow as to be scarcely navigable.

Hoboken, a village in Bergen Co. N. J., on the Hudson, opposite New York, and noted as the spot where many duels have been fought.

Hochberg, a castle of Baden, situate on a mountain, 2 m. N. E. of Emmendingen.

Holland, an important province of the Netherlands, which has often given name to the Seven United Provinces. It is divided into two parts, North and South Holland; and is bounded on the N. and W. by the German Ocean, on the E. by the Zuyder Zee and the adjacent state of Utrecht, and on the S. by the Meuse, and Dutch Brabant; extending from lat. 51. 40. to 53. 10.

N.; its longitude is about 180 m. E. of London. It contains 90 walled towns, beside many others, and above 400 villages. Before the Revolution in 1796, six large cities had seats in the states general; viz., Dort, Haerlem, Delft, Leyden, Amsterdam, and Gouda. The number of inhabitants was estimated at 800,000. They also reached this number in 1801; but in 1817 they had been reduced by the war to 748,000. The divisions into the two governments of South and North Holland was recognised by the constitution of 1814: the former contains 1,170 sq. m. with 389,000 inhabitants, and is divided into the six districts of the Hague, Leyden, Rotterdam, Dort, Gorcum, and the Briel; while Holland which in official papers, is called by its ancient name of West Friesland, contains 930 sq. m. with 359,000 inhabitants, and is divided into the four districts of Amsterdam, Haerlem, Hoorn, and Alkmaar. The whole province is a continued flat; and, but for the constant care in forming ditches and canals, it would be hardly capable of cultivation; some part of it lies even lower than the sea, from which it is secured by dikes, 25 or 30 feet high, and as many broad at the top. The climate is moist and variable, and in various places, particularly in North Holland, unfavourable to health. The winters are severe, and the rivers are almost every season rendered unnavigable, for several weeks together, by the ice. The soil is rich, consisting of a deep fat loam; but, owing to the humidity of both soil and climate, tillage is very limited. Wheat, madder, tobacco, hemp, and flax, are raised, but the chief agricultural wealth of the country consists in the pastures, which feed great number of cows; the making of butter and cheese being a principal occupation. The meadows are generally under water during the winter, and the inhabitants only discharge them from it by mills adapted as in the fenny parts of England to this particular purpose.

The natives of the United Provinces are of good stature, and inclined to be corpulent, but they are remarkable in general for a heavy, awkward mien; their features are regular, and their complexions fair. The better sort of people imitate the French fashions in their dress; but those who are stamped with the genuine character of their native country, never fail to load themselves with enormous incumbrances of clothes. The hats of the women are as large as tea-boards, projecting forward on each side so as to overshadow face and body. They are chiefly of straw, with two broad ribands, not tied, but pendent from the sides. This hat forms a striking contrast with the short dress, of which the milk-maids sold in our shops is a faithful picture. Both men and women wear at least two waistcoats, with as many coats, and the former cover their limbs with double trowsers.

The dress of the young girls is the most singular, especially at the time of any festival or holiday. In speaking of these, an amusing writer observes, that any one would have supposed that the figures which appeared were masques, or designed as caricatures. Imagine, says he, a short figure, with more breadth than goes to the proportion of elegance, and with very little alteration in the width downward to the waist, the petticoats descending only half way below the knee. Imagine further, a round small face covered with a hat of three feet in diameter, perfectly circular, and applied to the head in a part contiguous to the circumference. Then conceive a number of these figures in motion, brandishing their horizontal hats, rolling their diminutive eyes, and affecting a thousand ridiculous graces under cover of this extensive canopy. The tout ensemble may bring to the recollection those sculptural vagaries in which human figure is made the prop of a cathedral seat, the support of a waistcoat pulpit, or the stand of a mahogany table.

The Dutchman, living in continual danger of inundation, and of losing not only the fruits of his industry but his life, becomes habitually provident. His foresight is admirable, his perseverance not to be conquered, and his labours, unless seen, cannot be credited. They astonish the more, when the phlegm of his temper and the slowness of his habits are considered. View the minuteness of his economy, the solicitude of his precaution, and the inflexibility of his methodical prudence! Who would not pronounce him incapable of great enterprise? He builds himself a dwelling; it is a hut in size, and it is a palace in neatness. It is necessarily situated among damps upon a flat, and perhaps behind the bank of a sluggish canal; yet he writes upon it, "My Goeyne," "My delight"; "Landlust," "Country pleasures," "Land fight," "Country prospect, or some other inscription, that might characterize the vale of Tempe, or the garden of Eden. He cuts his trees into fantastic forms, hangs his awnings round with small bells, and decorates his Sunday jacket with dozens of little buttons. Too provident to waste his sweets, he cunningly puts a bit of sugar-candy in his mouth, and drinks his tea as it melts; one morsel serves, let him drink as long as he pleases. Around him is every token of care, caution, and cleanliness; but none in his domestic habits, or magnificence, or grandeur of design. The Dutch are usually distinguished into five classes; the peasants and farmers; seafaring men; merchants and tradesmen; those who live upon their estates, or the interest of their money; and military officers. The civet cat which is a native of the hottest climate of Africa, and Asia, is frequently reared in Holland where a great profit is obtained by their perfume. The civet of Amsterdam is better than that of the Levant or East Indies. Holland is said to have derived its name from the vast and thick forests of wood with which it was at one time covered; Holtland, in German, signifying woodland. In the middle ages it was governed by its counts or earls; in the 15th century it became subject to the house of Burgundy; it passed afterwards to Austria; and finally joined the other provinces that declared for independence. On the invasion of Holland by the French, in the beginning of 1795, the stadtholder with his family took refuge in England. Holland was subsequently under various forms of the French domination. At length the people became weary of this connexion. The events of 1813 had weakened the power that bound them; the people rose; their fetters were broken; and a provisional government was formed at Amsterdam on the 18th of November. William Frederick, of Nassau and Orange, landed from England at the close of the same month, entered Amsterdam on the 2nd of December, and was proclaimed Sovereign Prince of the United Netherlands, which had formerly been subject to the dukes of Burgundy, were re-united under the prince of Orange, as William I., king of the Netherlands, and these countries continued under one government till 1830. For an account of the revolution of that year, see Netherlands.

Holland, a strong town of E. Prussia, seated near the river Weeske, 14 m. S. E. of Elbing.

Holland, New, an island of the South Pacific Ocean, and the largest known land that does not bear the name of a continent. It extends from 109. to 153. E. long., and from 11. to 39. S. lat., or 2,730 m. from W. to E., and 1,960 from N. to S. When this vast island was first discovered is uncertain. The Portuguese and Spaniards appear to have visited it in the sixteenth century, but it was the Dutch who first made it known to Europe. In the beginning of the seventeenth century they traced the N. and W. coasts; and what was deemed, till lately, the S. extremity, was discovered by Tasman in 1642. Captain Cook, in 1770, explored the E. and N. E. from 38. S., and ascertained its separation from New Guinea; and in 1773, captain Furneaux, by connecting Tasman's discoveries with Cook's, completed the circuit. But the supposed S. extremity, which Tasman discovered by the name of Van Diemen Land, was found, in 1796, to be an island, separated from New Holland by a channel forty leagues wide, named from the discoverer, Bass's Strait. Different parts of the coast have been called by the names of the discoverers, &c. The eastern coast, called New South Wales, was taken possession of in his majesty's name by captain Cook, and now forms a part of the British dominions. See Wales, New South.

Holstebro, a town of Denmark, in North Jutland, situate on a shallow river which runs into the North Sea. The principal trade is in corn, oxen, and horses. It is 24 m. W. of Wiburg, and 68 N. of Ripen.

Holstein, a duchy at the N. extremity of Germany belonging to Denmark, 180 m. long and 50 broad; bounded N. by Sleswick, E. by the Baltic and the dutch of Saxe-Lauenburg, S. by the dukies of Bremen of Luneburg, and W. by the German Ocean. Its principal rivers are the Elbe, the Eyder, and the Stör. It is a fruitful country, and well seated for trade, having some considerable harbours, particularly those of Hamburg, Lubec, and Kiel; and from the latter is a canal to the Eyder at Rensburg, by which there is a free navigation from the Baltic to the German Ocean. Pop. in 1818, 360,000, most of whom are Lutherans.

Holston, a river of the United States which rises in the Alleghany mountains in Virginia, and flows S. S. W. into the State of Tennessee, where it takes a more Southerly course to Knoxville, and 35 m. below that town is joined by the Clinch, when their united waters take the name of Tennessee. It is navigable for boats of 25 tons upwards of 100 m. On its banks are several iron works; and the adjacent country abounds with iron ore, and has sundry lead mines.

Holt, a town in Norfolk, Eng. with an excellent free school founded by Sir John Gresham. It is situate in a fertile district, 24 m. W. N. W. of Norwich, and 119 N. E. of London.

Holy Island, an island on the coast of England, 8 m. S. E. of Berwick upon Tweed, but belonging to the county of Durham. It is 3 m. long and 2 broad; the soil rocky and full of stones; and at low water it is accessible by horses and carriages. It has a town called Kilo, and a castle on a high rock, under which is a commodious harbour, defended by a block-house. On this island are considerable remains of a stately monastery, called Lindisfarne, and here was anciently a bishop's see, removed with the body of St. Cuthbert, first to Chester le street, and afterwards to Durham.

Holyhead, a seaport and cape of Wales, in the isle of Anglesey. It derives its principal support from the expenditure of passengers to and from Ireland, being the usual place of embarkation for Dublin, and the station of the government packets to and from that city, distant about 20 leagues. In the neighbourhood is a large vein of white Fuller's earth, and another of yellow. Among the principal objects of interest are the venerable ruins of a hermitage, two chapels, and the remains of a Dutch wall; these, with the light-house and suspension bridge, attract the attention of strangers. The church, near the verge of the cliff, is a handsome structure of the thirteenth century: here are also 4 chapels for dissenters, a free school, and some almshouses. Pop. in 1821, 4,007. 207 m. N. W. of London. Long. 4 40 W., lat 53. 23. N.

Holyoke, Mount, an eminence near Northampton in Massachusetts. It is about 800 feet high, and may be easily ascended in a carriage. On the summit is a building erected for the accommodation of visitors who resort hither in summer to enjoy the beautiful prospect which the mountain affords. Southwardly is seen Connecticut river, retiring under the shade of Mount Tom, whitened below by South Hadley Falls; beyond which is the hill at Springfield. The river makes several turns, and on the horizon are 2 very distant peaks, which are supposed to be East and West Rocks, at New-Haven, about 70 m. distant. Northeast is seen Monadnoc Mountain in New-Hampshire; and the view toward the east is interrupted by the neighbouring peaks of Mount Holyoke. North, you look up the charming valley of the Connecticut; bordered by distant ranges of hills and mountains, varied by a few isolated peaks, covered with the richest coat of vegetation, and scattered with villages and innumerable farm houses. The river makes a beautiful serpentine course from where it first appears at the foot of Sugar Loaf Mountain, and Mount Toby, until it reaches the village of Hadley, which lies in full view; and then taking a bold sweep to the west, and flowing 4 m. it returns to the end of the street, only a mile distant from where it first meets it. The whole peninsula is rich and fertile, and covered with cultivated fields of wheat, corn, grass, &c. without being disfigured by fences, according to the custom prevalent hereabouts; this is the richest sight upon the river, particularly when viewed in connexion with the scene immediately below, where the river flows on, almost immediately under our feet, and the western shore presents the extensive Northampton meadows, a mile wide. Following the current with the eye, in the West south west, it forms a still more remarkable peninsula, although one of inferior size: the Hockanum Bend being a turn measuring 3 m. in circuit while the isthmus is only 46 rods across, or 150 yards. In the compass of this view, from the north to the west and south, numerous village spires are seen, with level fields, orchards, and gardens, almost without number; and the whole scene is so bounded with mountainous ridges, as to seem to justify the opinion of geologists, who say that it was once covered with an extensive lake, until the water forced a passage between Mounts Tom and Holyoke. Northampton is seen about west-north-west, with Round Hill; and towards the right, the top of Saddle Mountain, in the distance. There are also others still further north, particularly Haystack and Bare Mountain. More than 30 church steeples may be counted here.

Holywell, a town of Wales, in Flintshire, with a market on Friday. It has a neat parish church, and 4 places of worship for dissenters. From its vicinity to the mines, and the extensive manufactures carried on in the neighbourhood, it is become the most flourishing town in the county. Its name was derived from the famous well of St. Winifred, concerning which so many fables and superstitious notions have prevailed, but which is certainly a very remarkable spring, bursting out of the ground with great impetuosity, at the foot of a hill, and discharging upwards of 20 tons of water every minute. The waters have long since lost their reputation for miraculous healing powers, but are much esteemed by the manufacturer, being now applied to the purpose of turning several mills for the working of copper, making brass wire, paper, and snuff, and spinning cotton. It is 10 m. E. of St. Asaph, and 207 N. W. of London.

Holsappel, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Nassau. It is situated on the Lahn, at the foot of a mountain, on which is the tower of an ancient castle, the original seat of the princes of Nassau, 4 m. N. E. of Nassau.

Holzminden, a town of the state of Brunswick, in Wolfenbützel, with considerable iron works. It is seated at the conflux of the Holz with the Weser, 28 m. N. W. of Göttingen.

Homburg, a town of Germany, in Hesse-Cassel, with an iron forge and a glass manufacture, 20 m. S. of Cassel.—Also a town of Prussia, in the duchy of Berg, 48 m. S. E. of Düsseldorf.—And a town of Bavaria, in Deux Ponts; seated on a mountain, 5 m. N. W. of Deux Ponts.

Honan, a province of China, bounded on the N. by the provinces of Pe-tcheli and Chan-si, E. by Kiang-si and Chantong, S. by Hou-quang, and W. by Chensi. As every thing that can contribute to render a country delightful is found in this province, and as it is situated almost in the centre of the empire, the Chinese call it Tong-hoa, The Middle Flower. Besides Cai-fong, its capital, it contains eight cities of the first class and 102 of the second and third.

Honan, a city of China, of the first class, in the province of Honan, 360 m. S. W. of Peking. Long. 112. 9. E., lat. 34. 44. N.

Honawara, or Onore, a town of Hindoostan, in Canara, seated in an inlet of the sea, which spreads into a lake, and includes a number of islands. It was formerly a place of great commerce, but was demolished by Tippoo after he had recovered it by the treaty of Mangalore. Here is now a custom-house, and a few shops; also some merchants who live scattered near the banks of the lake, and sell rice, pepper, cocones, and betelnuts, &c., to the trading vessels that come from Goa, Rajaputra and Bombay. It is 50 m. N. by W. of Kandapura, and 84 S. S. E. of Goa.

Hondtchoote, a town of France, department of Nord, near which a part of the allied troops were surprised and defeated in 1793. 7 m. S. E. of Dunkirk.

Honduras, a province of Mexico, 490 m. long, and 150 broad bounded on the N. by a bay of its name, E. by the Atlantic, S. by Nicaragua, and W. by Guatemala and Vera Paz. The country consists of mountains, valleys and plains, watered by numerous rivers; and is exceedingly fertile. The vineyards bear thrice a year, and the soil in many parts yields 3 crops of maize; other productions are wheat, peas, cotton, wool, logwood, with excellent pastures, honey, wax, and provisions of all kinds. Honduras was formerly one of the most populous countries in America, but at present, though so fertile, is almost deserted. The capital is Valladolid, or Comayagua.

Honduras Bay, is that gulf of the Caribbean Sea between the peninsula of Yucatan and Cape Honduras. It is well known from the colonies settled on it by the British for the cutting down of mahogany and dye woods. The trees are cut at the wet season of the year, and after being dragged from the forest to the banks of the rivers, they are made into rafts and floated to the shore. The growth of the logwood here is extremely rapid, so much so that it is said to attain maturity in 5 or 6 years, when it is cut and sent to Europe in logs. Besides the mahogany and logwood tree, Honduras Bay, produces 2 or 3 kinds of the mangrove, as the red, white, and black. Cedars are large and abundant, and are commonly used in ship-building. The palmetto, the sapadilla, and the sea-grape trees, are all found very useful; as are also the bullet-tree, the iron-wood-tree, the calabash-tree, and the button-wood-tree. The althea grows at a considerable distance from the coast, and is generally made into rafts for floating the log-wood to the sea. The tree that exudes the resinous substance called coutchouc, or elastic gum, from which Indian-rubber is made, grows plentifully in several provinces of Guatemala, particularly in various parts of Honduras. In addition to those may be enumerated the locust-tree, the fustic, the cocoa-nut-tree, the cabbage, and the silk-cotton-trees, besides which both trees and shrubs of a medicinal nature grow in great variety and profusion. The soil which has been brought under cultivation is extremely fertile, and the climate is superior to a great part of the American continent. The shores abound with aquatic birds of different kinds. Myriads of swallows are found in some parts, particularly in Honduras, during the periodical rains. The humming-bird is seen in most of its splendid varieties, and the oxilia, one of the most minute and beautiful of this elegant tribe, is very common. The number of fish, insects, and reptiles, is also great.

Honfleur, a seaport of France, in the department of Calvados. The harbour is very capacious, at the mouth of the Seine; and its principal trade is in lace. 8 m. N. of Pont l'Eveque, and 110 N. W. of Paris. Long. 0. 15. E., lat. 49. 24. N.

Honiton, a borough in Devonshire, Eng. celebrated for the manufacture of broad lace. The church is half a mile from the town, but it has also a chapel belonging to the establishment, and three meeting-houses for Independents, Baptists, and Presbyterians. A fire happened here in 1747, which consumed three-fourths of the town; and another, in 1765, destroyed nearly 180 buildings. It is situated in a delightful vale on the river Otter, 16 m. E. of Exeter. Market on Saturday.

Hooghly, a river of Hindoostan, formed by the two westernmost branches of the Ganges, named the Cosimbazar and Jellinghy, which unite at Nudda. It flows by Hooghly, Chinsura, Chander-nagore, and Calcutta, to the bay of Bengal, and is the only branch of the Ganges that is commonly navigated by ships.

Hooghly, a city of Hindoostan, in Bengal, now nearly in ruins, but possessing many vestiges of former greatness. In the beginning of the eighteenth century, it was the great mart of the export trade of Bengal to Europe. It is seated on the river Hooghly, 25 m. N. of Calcutta.

Hot Spring, a country in Arkansas. Pop. 458. It is named from several Springs in the territory which have a temperature equal to that of boiling water. The water has no mineral properties but is remarkably limpid.

Hottentots, Country of the, a large region in the S. extremity of Africa, extending N. by W. from the Cape of Good Hope, beyond the mouth of Orange River, and from that cape, in an E. N. E. direction, to the mouth of the Great Fish River, which parts it from Caffraria. It is bounded on the W., S., and E., by the Atlantic, Southern, and Indian oceans, and on the N. by regions very little, if at all explored. The Hottentots are as tall as most Europeans, but are more slender; and the characteristic mark of this nation is, the smallness of their hands and feet, compared with the other parts of their body. Their skin is of a yellowish brown hue, resembling that of a European who has the jaundice in a high degree. There are not such thick lips among the Hottentots as among their neighbours the Negroes, the Caffres, and the Mozambiques; and their mouth is of the middling size, with the finest set of teeth imaginable. Their heads are covered with hair more woolly, if possible, than that of the Negroes. With respect to shape, carriage, and every motion, their whole appearance indicates health and content. They are excellent swimmers and divers, and practise bathing several times in the day. The women braid or plait their hair as an additional elegance, and adorn themselves with necklaces of shells. Both the men and women generally go bareheaded, and seldom wear any shoes. Both sexes wear rings on their arms and legs, chiefly made of thick leather straps, cut in a circular shape; but rings of iron, copper, or brass, of the size of a goose-quill, are considered more genteel. Girls are not allowed to use any rings till they are marriageable. Their habitations are adapted to their wandering pastoral life. They are merely huts, resembling a round beehive, from 18 to 24 feet in diameter, and so low that a middle-sized man cannot stand upright in them. The fire-place is in the middle, and they sit or lie round it in a circle. The low door is the only place that admits the light, and the only outlet that is left for the smoke. The order of these huts in a kraal, or clan, is most frequently in the form of a circle, with the doors inward; by which means a kind of yard is formed, where the cattle are kept at night. Such are the Hottentots in the vicinity of the Cape of Good Hope. In 1778, lieutenant Paterson visited a Hottentot village in Little Namaqua Land, in the N. W. part of the country; it consisted of 19 huts and about 150 inhabitants. The ensign of authority worn by their chief was a cane with a brass top, given to him by the Dutch East India Company. The Hottentots amused them, part of the night, with music and dancing: their visitors, in return, treated them with tobacco and dacks, or hemp leaves, which they prefer even to tobacco. Their music was produced from flutes, made of the bark of trees, of different sizes. The men form themselves into a circle, with their flutes; and the women dance round them. Among other tribes of Hottentots are the Bosjesmans, who inhabit the mountains in the interior part of the country, N. E. of the Cape, and live by hunting and plunder. On this account they render themselves odious to the planters, and are pursued and exterminated like wild beasts, or made slaves of when taken alive. Their habitations are not more agreeable than their manners or maxims; bushes and clefts in rocks serve them by turns for dwellings. Many of these savages are entirely naked; but some of them cover their body with the skin of any sort of animal. Being ignorant of agriculture, they wander over hills and dales after certain wild roots, berries, and plants, which they eat raw; also caterpillars, termites, locusts, grasshoppers, snakes, and spiders. Another tribe of Hottentots, near the mouth of Orange River, were observed by lieutenant Paterson, in his journey to the N. W. in 1799. Their huts were loftier, and thatched with grass; and were furnished with stools made of the back-bones of the grampus. Their mode of living is in the highest degree wretched, and they are apparently the most dirty of all the Hottentot tribes. Their dress is composed of the skins of seals and jackals, the flesh of which they eat. When a grampus is cast ashore, they remove their huts to the place, and subsist upon it as long as any part remains. They smear their skin with the oil, the odor of which is so powerful that their approach may be perceived some time before they appear in view. To the N. of the country of the Bosjesmans, and on the banks of Orange River, is another tribe called Koras, who may be reckoned to rank higher than any of the other Hottentots known in the S. of Africa. Their features are of a superior cast; they are more cleanly in their appearance, and neater in their dress and domestic utensils; their huts are also constructed with greater care, and with a view of being more durable. They seem to be a mixed breed, between the Hottentot and Caffre. The Hottentots, in general, are described as a mild, simple, affectionate, and inoffensive race; but extremely indolent in their habits, and limited in their faculties. Where, however, any sort of effort has been made to cultivate their powers, and give them a feeling of hope and liberty in their occupations, they have been found active, intelligent, and useful. No traces of religion appear to have been retained by this people. But Christianity has been introduced, through the exertions of the Moravians and other missionaries, who have recently endeavoured, with some degree of success, to ameliorate the condition even of some of the wilder tribes, who inhabit the N. and N. W. of the colony. The country possessed by the Europeans is considerable; extending from the Cape of Good Hope, N. to lat. 30, and E. to the Great Fish River, about 550 m. in length, and 230 in breadth. The whole is naturally barren and mountainous; but the industrious Dutch overcame all natural difficulties, and it produces not only a sufficiency of all the necessaries of life for the inhabitants, but also for the refreshment of all the European ships that touch at the Cape. The year is considered as divided into two seasons, termed monsoons: the wet monsoon, or winter, begins in March; and the dry one, or summer, in September. Among the quadrupeds of this country are antelopes, which go in large herds; buffaloes; camelopardalises; the gemsbock, a species of antelope, which has remarkably long sharp horns, and, when attacked by dogs, will sit on its hind quarters, and defend itself; wild dogs, which travel in herds, and are very destructive to sheep; elephants; elks; hyenas; the koedo, an animal rather larger than a deer, of a mouse colour, with three white stripes over the back, and the male having very large twisted horns; lions; jackals; tigers; the quagga, a species of zebra, but more tractable; rhinoceroses; horses; domestic horned cattle; common sheep, and a peculiar species of sheep covered with hair instead of wool. The hippopotamus, or river-horse, is frequently seen here. Among the birds are vultures, ostriches (whose eggs are excellent food), and the loxia, a species of gregarious bird. Among the insects are a species of termites, which do no injury to wood as in the East Indies, but, by raising a number of hills, they impede the progress of vegetation. The black or rock scorpion, is nearly as venomous here as any of the serpent tribe, of which there are numerous kinds.

Houat, an island of France, between Belleisle and the continent. It is 10 m. in circumference, and is defended by a fort.

Huddersfield, a populous and flourishing town in W. Yorkshire, Eng. Here is a large circular hall, in which narrow and broad cloths, serges, kerseymeres, &c., manufactured in the town and neighbourhood, are weekly exposed to sale. It stands on the Colne, 3 m. from the Calder, from which it has a canal to Ashton-under-Line. In addition to the parish church, two others have been erected—Trinity Church, in 1819, and Christ Church, completed in 1824; and there are several meeting-houses for the different denominations of dissenters. The charitable institutions are numerous, and a mechanic's institute was established in 1825, to which a valuable library has since been attached. It is 41 m. S. W. of York, 25 N. E. of Manchester, and 189 N. N. W. of London.

Hudson's Bay, a bay of North America, lying between 51. and 69. N. lat., discovered in 1610 by captain Henry Hudson. The entrance of the bay, from the ocean, is between Resolution Isle on the N. and the Labrador coast on the S., forming the E. extremity of the strait distinguished by the name of its great discoverer. It communicates on the N. by two straits with Baffin's Bay, on the E. side it is bordered by Labrador, on the S. W. by New South Wales, and on the W. by New North Wales. These countries, included under the name of New Britain, abound with animals whose skins and furs are far superior in quality to those found in less northerly regions. In the region to the westward Captain Franklin discovered that beautiful little animal which he named Parry's Marmot in honour of the celebrated navigator of that name. It bears a strong resemblance to the striped squirrel. The natives are called Esquimaux and northern Indians; and are materially different from the southern tribes. In 1670 a charter was granted to a company for the exclusive trade to this bay. The territories claimed by this company are stated by some writers to extend from 70. to 115. of W. long., and as far as 49. S. lat., thus comprehending a length of 1,300 or 1,400 geographical m. by a medial breadth of 350 m. Animated by a prospect of gain, the company have pushed their discoveries into the interior, and thus has a knowledge of these vast wilds been obtained, beyond what any other motives would have supplied. In December, 1770, Mr. Hearne set out from Prince of Wales Fort to explore a river that the Esquimaux, who came to the company's factories to trade, had brought to their knowledge, and which, on account of much copper being found near it had obtained the name of Copper-mine River. Under the convoy of those Indians, he arrived at this river in June 1771, and traced it till he came in sight of the Arctic Ocean, finding it encumbered with shoals and a bar at its mouth, which is in long. 119. W., lat. 72. N. In 1789 Mr. Mackenzie, another officer of the company, explored the country still more to the W.; and entering a river (now called after his name), which is the outlet of the Slave-lake, he traced it to its mouth in the Arctic Ocean, where it forms a wide estuary in long. 135. W., lat. 71. N. Further discoveries have been made by Capt. Franklin.

Hudson, a city of New York, in Columbia county with considerable manufacturing business. The streets are spacious, and cross each other at right angles; and the houses are supplied with water brought in pipes from a spring 2 m. distant. The trade is considerable, and vessels of the largest size can unload here. It is seated on an eminence, on the E. side of Hudson River. Pop. 5,392. 30 m. S. of Albany, and 120 N. of New York.

Hudson, villages in Caswell Co., N. C. and Portage Co. Ohio.

Hudson, a river of the United States, which passes its whole course of 300 m. in the state of New York. It rises between the lakes Ontario and Champlain, and flows S. by Albany, and Hudson, and enters the Atlantic Ocean at New York. It is navigable for ships to Hudson, and for sloops to Albany, and is one of the finest navigable streams in the world.

Hudwicksnald, a seaport of Sweden, the chief town of Helsingia, with a good harbour, on the gulf of Bothnia. The inhabitants carry on an advantageous trade in timber, flax, linen, butter, fish, &c. 185 m. N. by W. of Stockholm. Long. 17. 46. E., lat. 62. 6. N.

Hue, or Huefo, the capital of Cochin China, with a royal palace. The inhabitants blacken their teeth, thinking it a shame to have them white, like dogs. It is seated in a beautiful plain, and divided into two parts by a large river, 30 m. from its mouth, in the China Sea. Long. 107. 25. E., lat. 16. 25. N.

Hughesburgh. See Catawissa.

Hull, or Kingston upon Hull, a borough and seaport in East Yorkshire, Eng. The commerce of this place is considerable, and it is deemed the fourth port in the kingdom. Besides its communication with the Yorkshire rivers and canals, it has access also to the Trent, and all its branches so that it has the import and export trade of many of the northern and midland counties. The foreign trade is chiefly to the Baltic; but it is also one of the privileged ports for trading to the East Indies, and has traffic with the southern parts of Europe, and with America. More ships are sent hence to Greenland than from any other port, that of London excepted. The harbour is artificial; and here are docks for building and repairing ships. Among the public buildings are the Trinity-house, for the relief of seamen and their widows, an armoury, a naval storehouse, a custom-house and an exchange. It is seated on the northern side of the Humber about 20 m. from its mouth, the town extending almost in a direct line along the river Hull, and lying on a level tract of ground, washed on two of its sides by the Hull and the Humber. It is now well secured from inundations by embankments. 38 m. S. E. of York, and 171 N. of London.

Hunfeld, a town of Germany, in the district of Fulda, with a collegiate church. 10 m. N. of Fulda.

Hungary, a country of Europe, forming an important part of the Austrian dominions. At differ ent periods this name has been applied with a very different signification. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries Hungary comprised part of modern Poland and European Turkey, and was divided into ten separate governments, or kingdoms, viz. Hungary Proper, Croatia, Slavonia, Dalmatia, Bosnia, Bulgaria, Moldavia, Galicia, and Lodomeria, besides the principality of Transylvania. Several of these provinces have long since been detached from Hungary; but that country has still a close political and military connexion with the Austrian provinces of Slavonia, Croatia, and Dalmatia. This kingdom (for such it is still termed) is surrounded by mountains, except on the S. where its frontier is along the Danube and the Drave. It is bounded on the W. by part of Germany, N. by Galicia, E. by Transylvania and Wallachia, and S. by Turkey, Slavonia, and Croatia; and has a territorial extent of 84,500 square m. It was formerly divided into Upper and Lower Hungary; but this division has been superseded by that of the following circles:—1. Circle this side the Danube 2. Circle beyond the Danube; 3. Circle this side the Theys; 4. Circle beyond the Theys; 5. Province of Slavonia; 6. Province of Croatia. These are divided into counties, of which there are thirteen in the first circle, and eleven in each of the others. The principal rivers are the Danube, the Drave, the Marosch, the March, the white Korosch, the Isamos, the Theys, the Waag, and the Temes. The chief lakes are Balaton and Neusiedl, W.; Palitsch on the S. W., and Grunsee or the Grun Lake among the Carpathians. There are also several extensive marshes here, as that of the Isle of Schut on the W. and that of Saxetje on the E. of the kingdom. The climate among the mountains is of course bleak; but in the S. it is in general mild; in the sandy districts extremely hot; on the banks of the rivers and near the marshes there is much humidity: indeed this is a prevailing characteristic of the climate of the level part of Hungary. The country abounds in all the necessities of life, and the wine, especially that called Tokay, is excellent. There are mines of gold, silver, copper, and iron; and also of opal at Czerweniza, which gem is peculiar to this country. There is such plenty of game that hunting is allowed to all. The trade principally consists in cattle, hogs, sheep, flour, wheat, rye, wool, and wine; and these are almost wholly sent to the Austrian provinces. The commerce of the country is fettered by no internal taxes, a circumstance of which the Hungarians are very proud; but the Austrian government has envied it with custom houses, where a duty of one and one-third per cent. is gathered on all goods that pass into it from the other Austrian states. We may thus see that the encouragement of manufactures within the kingdom will never, voluntarily become the policy of that government. The kingdom of Hungary can easily raise an army of 100,000 men. The horsemen are called Hussars, and the foot Heydukes. The government is hereditary in the house of Austria, and the established religion is popery, though there are a great number of protestants. No country in the world is better supplied with mineral waters and baths; and those of Buda, when the Turks were in possession of it, were reckoned the finest in Europe.

Hungerford, a town in Berkshire Eng. with a good trade by its canal navigation. John of Gaunt granted a charter by the gift of a brass bugle horn, which is blown annually for the inhabitants to elect the constable, who is the chief officer. It is seated on the Kennet, 22 m. S. S. W. of Abingdon, and 64 W. of London.

Huninguen, a town of France, in the department of Upper Rhine, seated on the Rhine. The strong fortress of Huninguen, which for a long time held out against the allies in 1815, was afterwards demolished in consequence of a stipulation in the treaty of Paris. 2 m. N. of Basel, and 14 E. of Altkirch.

Hunmanby, a town in East Yorkshire, Eng. The town is pleasantly situated on a rising ground, surrounded by a fine wood on the N. W., within two miles of the sea, and contains many good houses. 39 m. N. E. of York, and 207 N. of London.

Huntingdonshire, a county of England, 25 miles long and 20 broad; bounded on the N. W. and N. by Northamptonshire, E. by Cambridgeshire, and S. W. by Bedfordshire. It contains 240,000 acres; is divided into four hundreds, and 107 parishes; and has six market towns. It sends four members to parliament. The principal rivers are the Ouse and Nen. The S. E. part consists of beautiful meadows. The middle and western parts are fertile in corn, and adorned with woods; and the upland part was anciently a forest, peculiarly adapted for hunting. The N. E. part consists of fens, which join those of Ely; but they are drained, so as to afford rich pasturage, and even large crops of corn. In the midst of them are some shallow pools abounding with fish; and a lake six miles long and three broad, called Whittleseamere. The principal commodities are corn, malt, and cheese; and it fattens abundance of cattle.

Iceland, an island of the North Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Denmark, extending according to Henderson from lat. 63. 29. to 67. 20., and between 15. 30. and 22. 30. W. long. It is of an irregular oval figure, about 360 m. in length, and 230 in its greatest breadth. For two months together the sun never sets; and in the winter it never rises for the same space, at least not entirely. The coast is indented all round with numerous deep gulfs, bays, and creeks, several of which form excellent harbours. The island is mountainous, stony, and barren; but in some places there are excellent pastures. The chief rivers are in the E. part; the Skalfanda, Oxarfird, and Bruna, all flowing from S. to N. Some are white with lime, others smell of sulphur. The principal mountains, clothed with perpetual snow, are called Yokuls; and of these Snafial, hanging over the sea on the S. W. coast, is esteemed the highest, being computed at 6,860 feet. Mount Hecla, about 2,000 feet in height, is the most noted, and is a volcano: there are also several other volcanoes and the convulsions caused by them in 1783 were so dreadful and multiplied that it was feared the island would fall to pieces; the eruptions were the most tremendous of any recorded in history. The last eruption, which was less terrific in its consequences, occurred in December 1821. The climate is not extremely cold, but the seasons are variable. The sea, at a small distance from the shores, is seldom frozen; and very little ice is ever seen near the W. coast, notwithstanding its proximity to Greenland. Iceland is governed as a dependency of Denmark, and is divided into four provinces, 19 shires, and 184 parishes. The inhabitants were estimated at 50,092 in 1824. Their houses are at a distance from each other, and many of them deep in the ground; but they are all miserable hovels of turf, without windows, and those of the common class are such wretched dens that it is wonderful how anything in the human form can breathe in them. The Danes trade with the natives for hides, tallow, train oil, whalebone, and seahorses' teeth, which are as good as ivory. The established religion is the Lutheran, and there are 300 churches in the island. The distressing scarcity of bibles which had long prevailed, was relieved, in 1815, by a liberal distribution from Britain, which were received with the greatest thankfulness. The principal school, held at a place called Beseestadt, near the W. coast, has three masters, who teach the classics, theology, and the Danish language; and societies have been formed for the cultivation of literature.

Icolmkill, or Iona, one of the Hebrides, near the S. W. point of the isle of Mull, only 4 m. long, and one broad. Here are the ruins of an augustine nunnery, monastery, and cathedral, said to have been founded by St. Columba, about the year 735; also a small chapel dedicated to St. Oran, containing many marble tombstones of the great lords of the isles; and adjoining it is a cemetery, in which many ancient kings of Scotland, Ireland, and Norway, are buried. Other ruins of monastic and druidical edifices can be traced; and many places are pointed out, noted for particular acts of St. Columba. This island was the retreat of learning, during the Gothic ignorance which pervaded Europe, after the overthrow of the Roman Empire; and the seminary whence issued those pious monks and laymen who again revived learning, and propagated Christianity through many kingdoms of Europe.

Ida, a lofty and pointed mountain in the middle of the island of Candia, famous in ancient times as being the place on which Jupiter was brought up, and where there was a temple dedicated to Cybele.

Ida, a mountain of Asiatic Turkey, 140 m. to the W. of Olympus.

Idanha a Nova, a town of Portugal, in Beira, 3 m. S. W. of Idanha a Velha.

Idanha a Velha, a town of Portugal, in Beira. The French took it by assault in 1704. It is seated on the Ponsal, 25 m. E. of Castel Branco. Long. 6. 14. W., lat. 39. 39. N.

Idria, a town of the Austrian states, in Carniola, celebrated for its rich quicksilver mines, 20 m. E. N. E. of Gorz.

Idstein, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Nassau, with a castle, the residence of the duke; situate in a district containing several forests and iron works, 16 m. N. of Mentz, 22. S. W. of Wetzlar.

If, an island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of France, the most eastern of the three before the harbour of Marseilles, and well fortified.

Iglau, a fortified town of Moravia, capital of a circle of the same name, with two convents and a college. Good cloth is manufactured here, and the commerce in corn and hemp is considerable. It is seated on the Igla, 40 m. W. N. W. of Brinn. Long. 15. 32. E., lat. 49. 28. E.

Iglesias, a town of the island of Sardinia, and a bishop's see, 37 m. W. S. W. of Cagliari. Long. 8. 30. E., lat. 39. 18. N.

Ihor. See Johore.

Ikery, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, formerly the capital of a principality. It was of a great size, surrounded by three concentric walls; but, the court being removed to Nagara, the inhabitants willingly followed, and the town was depopulated.

Ila. See Isla.

Ilak, or Jalak, a town of Nubia, on the Nile, supposed by some to be the ancient Meroe. Long. 34. 30. E., lat. 18. 48. N.

Ilanz, a town of Switzerland, in the Grisons, capital of the Grey League. It is seated on the Rhine, 23 m. S. W. of Coire.

Ilchester, or Iselchester, a borough in Somersetshire, with a market on Wednesday. It is a place of great antiquity, and the birth-place of the celebrated Roger Bacon. The election of the county members is held here, and here also is the county gaol. It is seated on the Ivel, 16 m. S. by W. of Wells, and 122 W. by S. of London.

Ildefonso, St., a town of Spain, in New Castile, noted for a magnificent summer palace, built by Philip V.; and for a large manufacture of glass, belonging to the crown. It is 5 m. N. of Uzeda, and 40 N. W. of Madrid.

Ildefonso, St., a town of Mexico, in the province of Guaxaca, seated on a mountain, 70 m. E. N. E. of Guaxaca.

Ilerton, a village in Northumberland, Eng. 4 m. S. of Wooler. On a hill near it is a semicircular encampment, defended by two high rampiers of earth, and a deep fosse, with an inner circle of stones, which appear un cemented. The area is about 100 yards diameter, and contains many remains of buildings.

Ilfracombe, a sea-port in Devonshire, Eng. It has a spacious natural basin, with a good pier and quay, projecting into the Bristol Channel. This port employs a number of brigs and sloops, chiefly in carrying ore from Cornwall, coal from Wales, and corn from Bristol; also a number of fishing skiffs. It is 49 m. N. N. W. of Exeter, and 303 W. of London.

Ilesee, a province of Brazil, S. of that of All Saints Bay. Its chief town of the same name is seated at the mouth of the river Ilheos, 130 m. S. S. W. of St. Salvador. Long. 40. 15. W., lat. 14 55. S.

Iluck, a town of Poland, in the Palatinate of Cracow, remarkable for its silver and lead mines, 15 m. N. W. of Cracow.

Ille, a town of France, in the department of Eastern Pyrenees, on the river Teck, 10 m. W. of Perpignan.

Ille-et-Vilaine, a department of France, containing part of the late province of Bretagne. It takes its name from two rivers, which unite at Rennes, the capital of the department.

Ilser, a river of Germany, which rises in Tyrol, runs N. through Bavaria, and joins the Danube near Ulm.

Ilseaca, a town of Spain, in New Castile, 15 m. S. S. W. of Madrid, and 15. N. N. E. of Toledo.

Illinois, a river of North America, formed by the junction of several streams near the S. end of Lake Michigan: after taking a S. W. course of 250 m. it enters the Mississippi, 30 m. above the influx of the Missouri.

Illinois, one the United States, bounded on the N. by the N. W. Territory. E. by Indiana. S. by Kentucky and W. by the State and Territory of Missouri. It extends from 37. to 43. 30. N. lat. and from 87. 17. to 91. 50. W. long. 350 m. in length and 160 in mean breadth and containing 56,000 sq. m. The Mississippi washes its western, and the Ohio its southern border, and it is traversed by the Illinois and Kaskaskia rivers. The N. E. corner touches upon Lake Michigan. This State is not traversed by any ranges of hills or mountains; the surface in general is level, but in a few instances uneven, and approaching to hilly. It may be arranged under three general heads. 1. The alluvions of rivers, which are from one to eight m. in width, in some places elevated, and in others low, and subject to inundation. They consist of an intermixture of woods and prairie. The soil is almost invariably fertile—such are the ranks, on the Mississippi, Wabash, Illinois, Kaskaskia, &c. 2. After leaving the alluvions, and rising to the 'bluffs' which bound them, is a tract of level land, elevated from fifty to one hundred feet, and which is sometimes called 'table land.' The greater proportion of this is prairie, which in some places is dry, and in others wet and marshy, depending upon the convexity or concavity of the surface. The soil is less fertile than that of the alluvions, but is generally preferred by emigrants. The tract of country between the Mississippi and Kaskaskia rivers belongs to this class. 3. In the interior and towards the northern part of the State, the country becomes rough and uneven. It consists of an intermixture of woods and prairies, diversified with gentle or abrupt slopes, sometimes attaining the elevation of hills, and irrigated with a number of streams. The most of the country which lies south of a line drawn from the mouth of the Wabash to the mouth of the Kaskaskia, is covered with timber. A very few prairies, and those inconsiderable in point of size, may be found immediately south of this line. Crossing that line, the timber is found to decrease in quantity, and the prairies to expand; yet the latter are still comparatively small, wholly unconnected with each other, and their outlines distinctly marked by the thick forests which surround and separate them. Advancing to the north, the prairie surface begins to predominate; the prairies now become large, and communicate with each other like a chain of lakes, by means of numerous avenues or vistas; still, however, the traveller is surrounded by timber; his eye never loses sight of the deep green outline, throwing out its capes and headlands; though he sees no more than dense forests and large trees, whose deep shade almost appalled him in the south. Travelling on from the centre of the State to its northern limit, we find ourselves surrounded by one vast prairie. In the country over which we have passed, the forest is interspersed with these interesting plains; here, the prairie is studded with groves and coppes, and the streams fringed with stripes of woodland. The eye sometimes wanders over immense plains covered with grass, discovering no other object on which to rest, and finding no limit to its vision but the distant horizon; while more frequently it wanders from grove to grove, and from one point of woodland to another, charmed and refreshed by an endless variety of rural beauty. The growth of the bottom lands consists of black walnut, ash of several species, hackberry, elm, (white, red, and slippery,) sugar-maple, honey-locust, buck-eye, catalpa, sycamore, cottonwood, pecan, hickory, mulberry, several oaks—as, over cup, bur oak, swamp or water oak, white, red or Spanish oak; and of the shrubbery are red-bud, papaw, grape vine, dogwood, spice bush, hazle, green-brier, &c. Along the margin of the streams, the sycamore and cottonwood often predominate, and attain to an amazing size. The cottonwood is of rapid growth, a light, white wood, sometimes used for rails, shingles, and scantlings, not lasting, nor of no great value. Its dry, light wood is much used in steam-boats.

The northern portion of Illinois is said to be inexhaustibly rich in mineral productions, while coal, secondary limestone, and sandstone, are found in every part. Iron ore is often found in the southern parts of the State, and is said to exist in considerable quantities near the rapids of Illinois. Native copper in small quantities has been found on Muddy river, in Jackson county, and back of Harrisonville, in the bluffs of Monroe county. One mass weighing seven pounds was found detached at the latter place. A shaft was sunk forty feet deep in 1817, in search of this metal, but without success. Red oxide of iron and oxide of copper were dug out. Crystallized gypsum has been found in small quantities in St. Clair county. Quartz crystals exist in Gallatin county. Silver is supposed to exist in St. Clair county, 2 m. from Rock-Spring, from whence Silver creek derives its name. In the early settlements by the French, a shaft was sunk here, and tradition tells of large quantities of the precious metal being obtained. In 1828, many persons in this vicinity commenced digging, and began to dream of immense fortunes, which however vanished during the following winter. They dug up considerable quantities of hornblende the shining specula of which were mistaken for silver. Lead is found in vast quantities in the northern part of Illinois, and the adjacent territory. Here are the richest lead mines hitherto discovered on the globe. This portion of country lies principally north of Rock river and south of the Wisconsin. Dubuque's and other rich mines, are west of the Mississippi. There is scarcely a county in the State, but what can furnish coal in reasonable quantities. Large beds are said to exist near the junction of Fox river with the Illinois, and in the vicinity of the rapids of the latter. Salt is found in various parts of the State, held in solution in the springs. The manufacture of salt by boiling and evaporation is carried on in Gallatin county, 12 m. W. N. W. from Shawneetown; in Jackson county, near Brownsville; and in Vermillion county, near Danville. The springs and land are owned by the State, and the works leased. A coarse marble, much used in building, is dug from quarries near Alton, on the Mississippi, where large bodies exist. Scattered over the surface of the prairies, are large masses of rock, of granitic formation, roundish in form, usually called by the people lost rocks. They will weigh from one thousand to ten or twelve thousand pounds, and are entirely detached, and frequently are found several miles distant from any quarry. There has never been a quarry of granite discovered in the State.

Agriculture is thriving, but education in Illinois is still in its infancy, and many of the settlers have no proper view of its necessity and importance. Many adults, especially females, are unable to read or write, and many more, who are able to read a little, cannot readily understand what they attempt to read, and therefore take no pleasure in books and study. Common schools are usually taught some part of the year in most of the settlements, but more frequently by teachers wholly incompetent to the task. The Methodists are the most numerous religious sect. This state is divided in 52 counties, and has a pop. of 157,575, of whom 746 are slaves. The capital is Vandalia. The state was admitted into the Union in 1818. The legislature is composed of a Senate and House of Representatives called the General Assembly. The Senates are chosen for 4 years and the Representatives for 2. The governor is chosen for 4 years. Elections are popular, and suffrage is universal. In the northern part are many Indian tribes, as the Kaskas, Sauks, Foxes, Potawatamies, &c.

Ilm, a town of Saxony, on a river of its name, 13 m. N. W. of Rudolstadt, and 14 S. by E. of Erfurt.

Imen, a lake of Russia, in the government of Novogorod, 48 miles long, and from 12 to 18 broad. Near it stands the city of Novogorod. It communicates with lake Ladoga, by the river Volkhof.

Imenau, a town of Saxe-Weimar, in Henneberg. Near it is a mineral spring; also a copper and silver mine. It is seated near the source of the Ilm 17 m. E. S. E. of Schmalkalden.

Ilminster, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. with a manufacture of narrow cloths. It is seated among hills, near the river Ille, 26 m. S. W. of Wells, and 136 W. by S. of London.

Isley, a town in Berkshire, Eng. seated between two hills, 14 m. N. W. of Reading, and 54 W. of London.

Ist, a town of the Netherlands, in Friesland, seated on the Weymer, 12 m. S. of Lewarden.

Istrop, a town of Sweden, in W. Gothland, 27 m. S. S. E. of Gotheburg.

Itzen, a town of Hanover, in the province of Luneburg, 16 m. S. S. W. of Zell.

Itzehofen, a town of Prussian Saxony, 8 m. N. E. of Halle.

Imbro, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, about 20 m. in circumference. It is mountainous and woody, and affords plenty of game. Long. 26. 44. E., lat. 40. 10. N.

Imeritia, a country of Asia, lying E. of the Black Sea; bounded on the S. by Turkey, W. by Mingrelia, N. by Osseta, and E. by Georgia, of which it is properly speaking, a part. The inhabitants estimated at not more than 20,000 families, are scattered over the country in small hamlets. They send yearly considerable quantities of wine to the neighbouring parts of Georgia, in leathern bags, carried by horses: but they are without manufactures, very poor and miserable, and cruelly treated by their landlord. Cutais, or Cotatis, is the capital.

Immenstadt, a town of Bavaria, in the circle of the Upper Danube, situate on a small river which soon after joins the Iller, 12 m. S. of Kempten.

Imola, an episcopal town of Italy, in the delegation of Ravenna, with a strong citadel. It is surrounded by walls, towers, and ditches; contains 16 churches and 17 convents; and is seated on the Santerno, 13 m. W. by S. of Ravenna and 45 N. N. E. of Florence.

Inchbroyock, a small island of Scotland, in Forfarshire, within the mouth of the South Esk, near Montrose, with which it communicates by a drawbridge. It has also a large and convenient dry dock.

Inchcolm, a small island of Scotland, in the frith of Forth, near the village of Aberdour, on the coast of Fife. Here is the ruins of a famous monastery, founded by Alexander I. in 1123, to commemorate the hospitable treatment he received here from a hermit.

Inchgarvie, a small island of the frith of Forth, nearly in the middle of the passage over the Queensferry.

Inchkeith, a small island of the frith of Forth lying midway between the ports of Leith and Kinghorn. Here is a light-house, and also a ruinous fort.

Inchmarnock, a small island of Scotland, on the S. W. side of Bute. The ruins of a chapel dedicated to St. Marnock are still to be seen; and on the W. side are vast strata of coral and shells.

Indal, a town of Sweden, in Medelpadia, on a river of the same name, near its entrance into the gulf of Bothnia, 16 m. N. by W. of Sundia-wald.

Indrapour See Indrapour.

Inden Hoten, a town of Chinese Tartary capital of the Mantcheou Tartars, 420 m. E. N. E. of Pekin.

Independence, a township in Alleghany Co. N. Y. Pop. 877. Also townships in Sumner Co. N. J. Cuyahoga Co. Ohio and Bond Co. Illinois.

India, or Hind, a contraction of Hindoostan, is a name often given to that region of Asia lying to the S. of Tartary, and between Persia and China, with its independent islands. It contains, besides Hindoostan, the Birman Empire, Siam, Cochin China, Tonquin, Thibet, Japan, and Ceylon; but is now, in its geographical features, more usually, and far more properly, described under those respective heads, which see.

Indiana, one of the United States, bounded N. by Michigan Territory, E. by Ohio, S. by Kentucky: and W. by Illinois. It extends from 37 45. to 41. 50. N. lat. and from 84. 42 to 87. 49. W. long. It is 287 m. long, and 255 broad, and contains 36,000 sq. m. It is washed on the Southern boundary by the Ohio and traversed by the White and Wabash rivers.

There are no mountains in Indiana; the country, however, is more hilly than Illinois, particularly towards the Ohio river. A range of hills called the Knots, extends from the falls of the Ohio to the Wabash, in a south-west direction, which, in many places, produces a broken and uneven surface. North of these hills lie the flat woods, 70 m. wide. Bordering on all the principal streams, except the Ohio, there are strips of bottom and prairie land; both together from 3 to 6 m. in width. Between the Wabash and lake Michigan, the country is mostly champaign, abounding alternately with wood-lands, prairies, lakes and swamps. A range of hills runs parallel with the Ohio, from the mouth of the Great Miami to Blue river, alternately approaching to within a few rods, and receding to the distance of 2 m. Immediately below Blue river, the hills disappear, and there is presented to view an immense tract of level land, covered with a heavy growth of timber. North of the Wabash, between Tippecanoe and Ouitanon, the banks of the streams are high, abrupt and broken, and the land except the prairies, is well timbered. Between the Plein and Theakiki, the country is flat, wet and swampy, interspersed with prairies of an inferior soil. The sources of rivers are generally in swamps or lakes and the country around them is low, and too wet for cultivation. There are two kinds of prairies,—the river and the upland prairies. The former are bottoms, destitute of timber and are said to exhibit vestiges of former cultivation; the latter are from 30 to 100 feet more elevated, and are far more numerous and extensive. Some of them are not larger than a common field, while others extend farther than the eye can reach. They are usually bounded by heavy-timbered forests, and not unfrequently adorned with copses of small trees. In spring and summer, they are covered with a luxuriant growth of grass and fragrant flowers, from six to eight feet high. The soil of these plains is often as deep and fertile as the best bottoms. The intervals bordering on the Wabash are particularly rich. Wells have been dug in them, where the vegetable soil was 23 feet deep, under which was a stratum of fine white sand. The ordinary depth is from two to five feet. The principal productions of this state are wheat, Indian corn, rye, oats, barley, buck-wheat, potatoes, pulse, beef, pork, butter, whiskey and peach brandy. There are salt springs in different parts, but they are little used. The salt is more cheaply obtained from the neighbouring States. Coal, iron, and copper are found in some places.

The climate is generally healthy and pleasant, closely resembling that of Ohio. The Wabash is frozen over in the winter, so that it may be safely crossed on the ice. This state abounds with large caverns, the most celebrated of which is called the Epsom Salts Cave, from the quantity of that mineral which it contains. The hill, in which the cave is situated, is about 400 feet high from the base to the most elevated point; and the prospect to the south-east, in a clear day, is exceedingly fine, commanding an extensive view of the hills and valleys bordering on Big Blue river. The top of the hill is covered principally with oak and chestnut. The side to the south-east is mantled with cedar. The entrance is about midway from the base to the summit, and the surface of the cave preserves in general, about that elevation. After entering the cave by an aperture of twelve or fifteen feet wide, and in height, in one place, three or four feet, you descend with easy and gradual steps into a large and spacious room, which continues about a quarter of a mile, pretty nearly of the same appearance, varying in height from eight to thirty feet, and in breadth from ten to twenty. In this distance the roof is, in some places arched; in others a plane and in one place, particularly, it resembles an inside view of the roof of a house. At the distance above named, the cave forks; but the right hand fork soon terminates, while the left rises by a flight of rocky stairs, nearly 10 feet high, into another story, and pursues a course at this place nearly south-east. Here the roof commences a regular arch, the height of which, from the floor, varies from 5 to 8 feet and the width of the cave from 6 to 12 feet; which continues to what is called the creeping place, from the circumstance of the visitor's crawling 10 or 12 feet into the next large room. From this place to the Pillar, a distance of about one mile and a quarter, the visitor finds an alternate succession of large and small rooms, variously decorated; sometimes mounting elevated points by gradual or difficult ascents, and again descending as far below; sometimes travelling on a pavement, or climbing over huge piles of rocks, detached from the roof by some convulsion of nature; and thus continues his route, until he arrives at the pillar.

The aspect of this large and stately white column, as it comes in sight from the dim reflection of the torches, is grand and impressive. Visitors have seldom pushed their enquiries further than two or three hundred yards beyond this pillar. This column is about fifteen feet in diameter, from twenty to thirty in height, and regularly reeded from the top to the bottom. In the vicinity of this spot are some inferior pillars of the same appearance and texture. Chemically speaking, it is difficult to say what are the constituent parts of these columns, but lime appears to be the base. Epsom salts, abounds throughout this cave in almost its whole extent, in a manner which, has no parallel in the history of that article. This neutral salt is found in a great variety of forms, and in many different stages of formation, sometimes in lumps, varying from one to ten pounds in weight. The earth exhibits a shining appearance, from the numerous particles interspersed throughout the huge piles of dirt collected in different parts of the cave. The walls are covered in different places with the same article, and reproduction goes on rapidly. With a view to ascertain this, a visitor removed from a particular place every vestige of salt, and in four or five weeks the place was covered with small needle shaped crystals, exhibiting the appearance of frost. The quality of the salt in this cave is inferior to none. The worst earth that has been tried, will yield four pounds of salt to the bushel, and the best, from twenty to twenty five pounds. This quantity is inexhaustible. The next production is the nitrate of lime, or saltpetre earth. There are vast quantities of this. There are also large quantities of the nitrate of alumine, or nitrate of argil, which will yield as much nitrate of potash, or saltpetre, in proportion to the quantities of earth, as the nitrate of lime. The three articles above enumerated, are first in quantity and importance; but there are several others, which deserve notice as subjects of philosophical curiosity. The sulphate of lime, or plaster of Paris, is to be seen variously formed; ponderous, crystallized and impalpable or soft, light, and rather spongy. Vestiges of the sulphate of iron are also to be seen in one or two places. Small specimens of the carbonate, also the nitrate of magnesia, have been found. The rocks in the cave principally consist of carbonate of lime, or common lime stone. Near the forks of the cave are two specimens of painting, probably of Indian origin. The one appears to be a savage, with something like a bow in his hand, and furnishes the hint, that it was done when that instrument of death was in use. The other is so much defaced, that it is impossible to say what it was intended to represent.

This state is divided into 64 counties. The pop. is 341,583. In the N. part are many Potawatamies and Chippeway Indians. There are no slaves. The State was admitted into the union in 1816. The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Representatives, styled the General Assembly. The Senators are chosen for 3 years and the Representative for 1. The Governor is chosen for 3 years. Suffrage is universal. The capital of the state is Indianapolis. There is a college at Bloomington, and provision is made by the state for the support of schools.

Indiana, a county of the Western District of Pennsylvania. Pop. 14,351. The chief town has the same name. Also a town in Alleghany Co. Pa.

Indianapolis, the capital of the state of Indiana is situated in Marion county on White River in the centre of the state. It has but recently been established.

Indian Old Town, a settlement of Penobscot Indians, on an island in Penobscot river Maine, a little above the great falls. It consists of about 500 souls.

Indian Town, villages in Dorchester Co. Md. Currituck Co. N. C. and Williamsburg Dis. S. C.

Indies, East, the name given by Europeans to that vast tract of country in Asia which is situated to the S. of Tartary, between Persia and China (see Hindoostan), as well as to a great number of islands in the Indian Ocean, extending from the peninsula of Hindoostan as far E. as New Guinea, and from the bay of Bengal and the China Sea as far S. as New Holland. The most western of them are the Maldives, and the most eastern the Moluccas; between which are several very large ones, as Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, and Celebes; besides many others of considerable importance as to riches, though much inferior in extent.

Indies, West, a denomination under which is comprehended a large chain of islands extended in a curve from the Florida shore on the northern peninsula of America to the gulf of Venezuela on the southern. Columbus gave this name to them under the notion that they formed part of the Indian continent, which it was his object in his first voyage to find; and this opinion was so general that Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Castile, in their ratification of an agreement granted to Columbus, upon his return, gave them the name of Indies. Even after the error which gave rise to this opinion was detected, and the position of the New World was ascertained, the name has remained, and the appellation of West Indies is given by all the people of Europe to these islands, and that of Indians to the inhabitants, not only of these islands, but of the continent of America. The principal of these islands are Curacao, Trinidad, Tobago, Grenada, St. Vincent, Barbadoes, Martinique, Dominica, Marie Galante, Guadaloupe, Antigua, Barbuda, St. Christopher, St. Eustatia, St. Bartholomew, St. Martin, Anguilla, St. Thomas, Porto-Rico, St. Domingo, Jamaica, Cuba, and the Bahamas.

Most of the Antilles are situated under the tropic of Cancer, and there is not much difference in their climate; accurate observations made on any one of them may be applied with little variation to them all. The spring begins about the month of May; the savannas then change their russet hue, and the trees are adorned with a verdant foliage. The periodical rains from the south may at this time be expected; they fall generally about noon, and occasion a rapid and luxuriant vegetation. The thermometer varies considerably; it falls sometimes six or eight degrees after the diurnal rains; but its medium height may be stated at 78 of Fahrenheit. After these showers have continued for a short period, the tropical summer appears in all its splendour. Clouds are seldom seen in the sky; the heat of the sun is only rendered supportable by the sea breeze, which blows regularly from the south-east during the greatest part of the day. The nights are calm and serene, the moon shines more brightly than in Europe, and emits a light that enables man to read the smallest print; its absence is, in some degree, compensated by the planets, and above all by the luminous effulgence of the galaxy. From the middle of August to the end of September, the thermometer rises frequently above 90, the refreshing sea breeze is then interrupted, and frequent calms announce the approach of the great periodical rains. Fiery clouds are seen in the atmosphere, and the mountains appear less distant to the spectator than at other seasons of the year. The rain falls in torrents about the beginning of October, the rivers overflow their banks, and a great portion of the low grounds are submerged. The rain that fell in Barbadoes in the year 1754, is said to have exceeded 87 inches. The moisture of the atmosphere is so great, that iron and other metals easily oxydized are covered with rust. This humidity continues under a burning sun;—the inhabitants, (say some writers,) live in a vapour bath; it may be proved, without using this simile, that a residence in the lower part of the country at this season is disagreeable, unwholesome, and dangerous to a European. A gradual relaxation of the system diminishes the activity of the vital functions, and produces at last a general atony.

It has been observed by travellers that most of the wild animals indigenous to the West Indies are of a small size, as the Vespertilio molossus, the Viverra caudivolvula, and the Mus pilorides. Lizards and different sorts of serpents are not uncommon; but the greatest number of them are harmless, and, with the exception of Martinique and St. Lucia, no scorpions are to be found in the Lesser Antilles. This noxious reptile is frequently observed in Porto Rico, and it exists probably in all the larger islands. The cayman haunts the stagnant waters, and negroes are sometimes exposed to its murderous bite. The parrot and its various species from the macaw to the paroquet frequent the forests; aquatic birds in unnumbered flocks enliven the shores. The colibri or humming-bird is the sportive inhabitant of these warm climes; it seldom remains long in the same place, but is seen for a moment on the blossoms of the orange or lime tree, and displays in its golden plumage the brightest tints of the emerald and the ruby. Trees similar to those that we have admired in other tropical countries grow in equal luxuriance on these islands. The Bananas, which in its full growth appears like a cluster of trees, is at first weak, and requires the support of a neighbouring plant. A canoe made from a single trunk of the wild cotton tree, has been known to contain a hundred persons, and the leaf of a particular kind of palm tree affords a shade to five or six men. The royal palmetto or mountain-cabbage grows to the extraordinary height of two hundred feet, and its verdant summit is shaken by the slightest breeze.

Many of the plantations are enclosed by rows of Campeachy and Brazilian trees; the corab is as much prized for its thick shade as for its excellent fruit, and the fibrous bark of the great cecropia is converted into strong cordage. The trees most valuable on account of their timber, are the tamarindus, the cedar, the Spanish mountain ash, the iron tree, and the laurus chloroxylon, which is well adapted for the construction of mills. The dwellings of the settlers are shaded by orange, lemon, and pomegranate trees, that fill the air with the perfume of their flowers, while their branches are loaded with fruit. The apple, the peach, and the grape ripen in the mountains. The date, the sapata, and sapotilla, the mammee, several oriental fruits, the rose apple, the guava, the munga and different species of spondias and annonas grow on the sultry plains.

The heights are covered in many places with groves of the Myrtus pimenta, and no other shrub grows under its fragrant shade. The ignama and potato are the principal food of the negroes; manioc and angola pulse have been imported from Africa. But the West Indian planter is wholly occupied in ministering to the wants or luxuries of Europeans; were it not for the immense supplies of corn brought annually from Canada and the United States, these fertile islands might be desolated by famine. Sugar is the great staple considered in many respects superior to the common creole plant.

A field of canes is in arroyo or full bloom about the month of November. At this period of its growth there are few objects in the vegetable kingdom that can vie with it in beauty. The canes are seldom lower than three feet and sometimes higher than eight; this difference proceeds from the nature of the soil and the mode of cultivation.

A ripe field may be compared to an immense sheet of waving gold tinged by the sun's rays with the finest purple. The stem with its narrow depending leaves is at first of a dark green colour but changes as it ripens to a bright yellow: an arroyo or silver wand sprouts from its summit, and grows generally to the height of four or five feet; the apex is covered with clusters of white and blue flowers not unlike tufts of feathers. The finest plantations are sometimes destroyed by fire, a calamity which occurs too frequently in these islands. No conflagration is more rapid, none more alarming; those who have witnessed such scenes can best describe them. The hopes and fortune of the husbandman, the painful toil of many hundred slaves, the labour of years are in a few moments destroyed. If a plantation is by any accident set on fire, the inhabitants sound the alarm shell, and the shrill blast is repeated from the neighbouring hills. Rolling smoke, spreading flames, and cracking reeds are sometimes the first indications of danger. Louder notes are afterwards heard from a distance; bands of negroes hasten to the flames, their fears and exertions, the cruelty of their overseers, the noisy impatience of the planters, groups of horses and mules moving in the back ground increase the effect of so sublime a picture.

The cotton plant flourishes on dry and rocky lands, if they have not been too much exhausted by former cultivation. Dryness is of great advantage to it in all its stages; when the shrub is in blossom or when the pods begin to unfold, the plant is rendered completely useless by heavy rains. These observations apply to every species, but more particularly to that sort which is cultivated by the French settlers. There are several varieties of this shrub, all of them resemble each other; the best are the green seed, the Brazilian, and the French or small seed.

There is but one species of the coffee tree here; it is supposed to be a native of Arabia Felix. This commodity of the West Indies; the cane was transported hither from the eastern continent by Columbus in his second voyage. The Otakeis cane has been generally introduced into the Antilles since the time of Captain Cook; it is con-plant was brought to Batavia, from thence to Amsterdam and Paris, and afterwards transplanted to Surinam and Martinique. It seldom bears fruit before the third season, and sometimes not until the fifth or sixth; it never lasts more than thirty years, and frequently decays long before that time. A single plant may produce from one to four pounds of coffee.

These islands were the resort of the Buccaneers, those celebrated freebooters, so noted and formidable during the seventeenth century. These bold adventurers attacked, in small numbers, and with small means, but with an intrepidity which bade defiance to danger, not only single merchant vessels, but several of them together, and sometimes armed ships. Their common mode of attack was by boarding. They directed their efforts especially against the Spanish ships which sailed for Europe laden with the treasures of America. By the repeated losses which they suffered, the Spaniards were at last so discouraged, that they seldom offered a serious resistance. Their manner of dividing their booty was remarkable. Every one who had a share in the expedition swore that he had reserved nothing of the plunder. A false oath was of extremely rare occurrence, and was punished by banishment to an uninhabited island. The wounded first received their share, which was greater according to the severity of their wounds. The remainder was divided into equal parts, and distributed by lot. The leader received more than the others only when he had particularly distinguished himself. Those who had perished in the expedition were not forgotten. Their part was given to their relations or friends, and, in default of them, to the poor and to the church. Religion was strangely blended with their vices, and they always began their enterprises with a prayer. The wealth which they acquired was spent in gambling and debauchery, for it was the principle of these adventurers to enjoy the present and not care for the future. The climate and their mode of life gradually diminished their number, and the vigorous measures of the English and French governments at last put an end to their outrages, which had, perhaps, been purposely tolerated.

Indore, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Malwah, capital of one of the Poonah Maharatta chiefs, who was defeated by the British in 1804, and his successor compelled to enter into an engagement to renounce all connexion with the enemies of the British, and to furnish, when required, 3,000 cavalry. It is seated on a river that flows into the Nerbuddah, 23 m. S. E. of Ougein. Long. 76. 11. E., lat. 22. 5. N.

Indrapour, a seaport on the W. coast of Sumatra, capital of a district of the same name. 160 m. N. W. of Bencoolen.

Indre, a department of France, including part of the ci-devant province of Berry. It has its name from a river, which rises in this department flows into that of Indre-et-Loire, and joins the Loire 4 m. below the influx of the Cher. Its area is estimated at 5,869 sq. m.; its pop. 205,000. Chateauroux is the capital.

Indre-et-Loire, a department of France, including almost the whole of the province of Touraine and bounded by the departments of the Loire-et-Cher, the Indre, the Vienne, and the Maine. It consists mostly of fine plains, interspersed, however, with small hills. The principal rivers are the Loire, the Vienne, the Cher, and the Indre. Tours is the capital.

Indus, or Sinde, a great river of Asia, having its source in a range of mountains of Tartary, between 38. and 39. of N. lat. From Thibet it takes a S. W. course, and enters Hindoostan in about 35. N. lat. It has always been considered as the western barrier of Hindoostan. 60 m. from its source it is joined by the Cabul, when it is no longer fordable. Between 25. and 26. of lat. it enters the province of Sinde, and here we find it again divided into two considerable branches; the principal or western divided into numerous streams, which form a Delta similar to that of the Nile or Ganges: they are, however, very shallow and only navigable by boats. It is said to be 1,350 m. in length and some parts of it are capable of bearing vessels of 200 tons. But there is very little commerce transported by it. Its water is very wholesome. On the E. of this river is a great sandy desert, extending nearly 500 m. in length, and from 60 to 150 in breadth.

Industry, p.t. Somerset Co. Me. Pop. 902.

Ingelfingen, a town of Wurtemberg, on the Kocher, 20 m. S. S. W. of Mergentheim.

Ingelheim, a town of Germany, in Hesse-Darmstadt, seated on an eminence, on the river Salva, 9 m. E. of Bingen.

Inglesborough, one of the highest mountains of England, in Yorkshire, 8 m. N. N. W. of Settle. It is 2,361 feet above the level of sea.

Inglesville, p.v. Montgomery Co. Va.

Ington, a village in West Yorkshire, Eng. at the foot of Inglesborough mountain. It is tolerably well built, and has manufactures of cotton yarn. Near it are several collieries, which supply the surrounding country to a considerable distance with coals. 10 m. W. N. W. of Settle, and 245 N. W. of London.

Ingliis Island, an island on the N. coast of New Holland, near the entrance of the gulf of Carpentaria.

Ingolstadt, a town of Bavaria. It is one of the strongest places in Germany, surrounded by a morass. The houses are built of stone, and the streets are large. Here was formerly a university, which in 1800 was transferred to Landshut. It is seated on the Danube, 9 m. E. of Neuburg, and 45 N. by W. of Munich. Long. 11. 25 E., lat. 48. 46. N.

Ingraham Islands, a cluster of islands, seven in number, in the Pacific Ocean, discovered by Captain Ingraham, of Boston, in 1791, and named Washington, Adams, Lincoln, Federal, Franklin, Hancock, and Knox. Federal island (or Nocheva) is considered the largest, most populous, and fertile. They appear generally to be diversified with hills and valleys, and to be well wooded. Most of them are inhabited, and the people resemble those of the Marquesas.

Ingrande, a town of France in the department of Maine-et-Loire, situate on the Loire, 15 m. W. S. W. of Angers.

Ingra, a town of France in the department of the Loiret, 4 m. N. W. of Orleans.

Inishannon, a town of Ireland in the county of Cork, with a considerable linen manufacture; seated on the Bandon, 7 m. N. W. of Kinsale.

Inn, a large river of Austria, which rises in the Swiss canton of Grisons, flows N. E. through Tyrol and Bavaria, and joins the Danube at Passau, where it is nearly 900 feet wide. It becomes navigable at Hall, in the Tyrol, and its whole course is more than 250 m.

Innaconda, a fortress of Hindoostan, in the Guntoor circar, situate on a hill, 46 m. N. W. of Ongole.

Insch, a town of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, 26 m. W. N. W. of Aberdeen.

Innsbruck, a fortified town of Austria, capital of Tyrol, with a strong castle, formerly the residence of the archdukes of Austria. The principal manufacture is that of cotton, but it has also manufactures of silk and woolen stuffs, and all kinds of glass wares; and the transit trade from Germany to Italy is considerable. Innsbruck was entered by the French in 1805, and was the scene of several heroic efforts of the Tyrolese against the French and Bavarians in 1809. It is seated in a pleasant valley, on the river Inn, 62 m. S. of Munich.

Insterberg, a town and circle of East Prussia, on the Angerap, in the government of Gumbinnen. Its chief trade is in corn and linseed. The circle is of great extent, comprehending a pop. of 150,000. Part of it is covered with forests, but the soil of the rest is fertile, and pastures are extensive: manufactures are hardly known here. The town is 50 m. E. of Königsberg; and contains 5,300 inhabitants.

Interlachen, a town of Switzerland, capital of a bailiwick of the same name, in the canton of Bern, 28 m. S. S. W. of Lucern, and 32 S. E. of Bern.

Inverary, a borough of Scotland, of the county-town of Argyleshire, situate on the N. W. side of Loch Fyne, and the influx of the Aray. It has some manufactures and a trade in wool, timber, and oak bark; but its chief support is from the herring fishery. Near the town is Inverary Castle, the seat of the duke of Argyll; and in the neighbourhood is a considerable iron-work. The planting around Inverary is very extensive and admirably variegated. 45 m. N. W. of Glasgow, and 75 W. N. W. of Edinburgh.

Inverberrie. See Bervie.

Invergordon, a village of Scotland, in Ross-shire, at the mouth of the frith of Cromarty, 8 m. S. S. E. of Tain. It has a good harbour, and a regular ferry over the frith to the town of Cromarty.

Inverkeithing, a borough and seaport of Scotland, in Fifeshire, with a considerable trade in coal and salt. Before the entrance of the harbour is a bay, which affords safe anchorage for ships of any burden in all winds. The harbour itself is commodious, and has two quays. It is situate on the N. side of the frith of Forth, 18 m. N. W. of Edinburgh.

Inverleithen, a village of Scotland, on the river Tweed, at the influx of the Leithen, 5 m. E. of Peebles. Here is an extensive woolen manufacture; and near it is a sulphurous spring.

Inverness, a borough of Scotland, capital of a county of the same name, situate on both sides of the river Ness, near its entrance into the frith of Murray. It has a commodious harbour, and a good salmon fishery. The trade is very considerable, and the town is rapidly improving. The principal manufactures are those of hemp and flax; and there are also woolen and other manufactures, tanneries, brick works, &c., which furnish employment to many of the inhabitants. On an eminence are the ruins of the old castle, demolished by the rebels in 1746; and over the Ness is a stone bridge of seven arches. The courthouse, nearly in the centre of the town, is a modern building, with a fine tower, terminated by an elegant spire, which sustained considerable injury from the earthquake in 1816. Near this town, on Culloden Heath, the duke of Cumberland gained a decisive victory over the rebels in 1746. To the W. of the town is the hill of Craig Phatric, on the summit of which are the extensive remains of a vitrified fort, so called from the marks of fusion which the cement and stones exhibit. Inverness is 50 m. N. E. of Fort William, and 156 N. of Edinburgh.

Inverness-shire, the most extensive county of Scotland; bounded on the N. by Ross-shire; E. by the countries of Nairne, Murray, and Aberdeenshire; S. by those of Perth, and Argyll; and W. by the Atlantic Ocean. It also includes several of the Hebrides. Independent of the islands, it is 80 m. long and 50 broad. It comprehends the district of Badenoch, Lochaber, and Glenalgy, which are subdivided into 32 parishes. The principal towns are Inverness, Fort William (or Inverlochy), and Fort Augustus. The N. part is mountainous and barren, and supposed to be the most elevated ground in Scotland. This county has several considerable lakes, and is divided, in a manner, into two equal parts, by those of Ness, Oich, Lochy, and Lochiel, united by the Caledonian Canal, which forms a communication between the two seas. The extensive plains which surround the lakes are, in general, fertile; the high grounds feed many sheep and black cattle, numerous herds of goats are found in every district. The mountains and forests are inhabited by immense numbers of red and roe deer; the alpine and common hare, and other game, are also abundant. Limestone, iron-ore, and some traces of different minerals have been found in this county, with beautiful rock crystals of various tints; but no mines have hitherto been worked with much success. The principal rivers are the Spey, the Beaully, the Ness, and the Lochy.

Inverness, a township of Buckingham Co. L. C.

Inverurie, a village of Scotland, on the E. coast of Aberdeenshire at the mouth of the Ugie, 1 m. N. of Peterhead. It has an extensive bleach field, and a considerable brewery. Near it are the ruins of Inverurie Castle.

Inverury, an ancient borough of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, seated at the conflux of the Don and the Ury, 15 m. W. N. W. of Aberdeen.

Iona. See Icolmhill.

Ionia, p.v. Onondaga Co. N. Y.

Ionian Islands, a recently constituted republic of Europe, comprising, besides a number of islets, the 7 principal islands of Corfu, Cephalonia, Zante, Santa Maura, Ithaca, or Thiaki, Cerigo, and Paxo; of which Corfu, lying opposite to Albania is the most northerly. The territorial extent of this small state is estimated at about 1,500 sq. m. The climate is in general mild, but the transitions from heat to cold are sudden: hot and scorching winds are sometimes destructive to vegetation; and at certain seasons there are violent rains and thunder. They are all subject to slight earthquakes, which are sometimes confined to a single island. The soil in the plains and valleys is fertile in vines, corn, olives, currants, cotton, honey wax, &c. Pasturage is in general scanty; goats and sheep are reared in considerable number; but horses and cattle are brought from the continent. The wild animals are foxes, hares, and rabbits. Prior to the French revolution these islands were subject to Venice, but were ceded to France by the treaty of Campo Formio (1797.) After repeatedly changing masters, the republic was placed under the protection of Great Britain by the arrangements of the congress of Vienna; and a constitution for this small state was drawn up and ratified by the British government in July, 1817.

Ips, a town of Austria, near the conflux of the Ips with the Danube, 22 m. W. of St. Polten.

Ipsala, a town of European Turkey, in Romania, and a Greek archbishop's sea. Near it are mines of alum: and red wine is an article of commerce: It is seated on the Marissa, 43 m. S of Adrianople.

Ipsara, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, 15 m. N. W. of the island of Scio. To the W. is another small island, called Anti-Ipsara.

Ipsheim, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Bayreuth, 17 m. N. N. W. of Anspach.

Ipswich, a borough and principal town of Suffolk, Eng. It was once surrounded by a wall, traces of which are yet to be seen. It is irregularly built, and has declined from its former consequence, but now contains 12 parish churches, several meeting-houses for dissenters, a library, several hospitals, a free-school, a commodious market-place, a guildhall, a custom-house, and a county jail. Much corn and malt are sent hence to London, and great quantities of timber were formerly sent to the king's dockyard at Chatham. It has a considerable coasting trade, a small share of foreign commerce, and sends ships to Greenland. Vessels of large burden are obliged to stop at some distance below the town. It is the birthplace of cardinal Wolsey; and is seated on the Orwell, 26 m. S. E. of Bury St. Edmund, and 69 N. E. of London.

Ipswich, p.t. Essex Co. Massachusetts, situated on a river of the same name, about a mile from the sea. 23 m. N. E. of Boston. Pop. 2,951. The manufacture of lace is carried on in this town to a considerable extent.

Irac, a province of Persia, comprehending the greater part of the ancient Media. It is bounded S. by Fars and Khuzistan, E. by Khorassan and the Great Salt Desert, W. by Kurdistan, and N. by Azerbaijan, Ghilan, and Mazanderan, and divided into five districts, Ispehan, Tehraun, Naen, Mullager, and Kermanshaw.

Irac-Arabi (the ancient Chaldaea), a province of Turkey in Asia, bounded W. by the desert of Arabia, N. by Kurdistan and Diarbeck, E. by Khuzistan, and S. by the gulf of Persia and Arabia. Bagdad is the capital.

Irbti, or Irbitikaia, a town of Russia, in the government of Perm, on the river Irbti, and the frontiers of Siberia. In the vicinity is a large iron-work, which yields nearly 2,000 tons of iron a year. 142 m. N. E. of Ekaterinenburg.

Ireby, a town in Cumberland, Eng. seated in a valley, at the source of the Ellen, 10 m. N. E. of Cocker-mouth, 303 N. N. W. of London.

Fredell, a county of North Carolina. Pop. 15,262. Statesville is the chief town

Ireland, the second in magnitude of the British Isles, is situated to the W. of Great Britain, in the Atlantic Ocean. It is bounded on the N. W. and S. by the Atlantic, and on the E. by the North Channel, the Irish Sea, and St. George's Channel, which separate it from England. Its greatest length is about 300 m. and its maximum breadth about 110 m. The superficial contents are estimated at about 90,000,000 of English acres. Ireland is divided into four provinces; namely, Ulster, to the N., Leinster to the E., Munster to the S., and Connaught to the W.; and these are subdivided into 32 counties. Ulster contains the counties of Down, Armagh, Monaghan, Cavan, Antrim, Londonderry, Tyrone, Fermanagh, and Donegal; Leinster has those of Dublin, Louth, Wicklow, Wexford, Longford, East Meath, West Meath, King's county, Queen's county, Kilkenny, Killdare, and Carlow: Munster includes Clare, Cork, Kerry, Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford; and Connaught has Leitrim, Roscommon, Mayo, Sligo, and Galway. The climate of Ireland is mild and temperate, but more humid than in England. It is on the whole, of a mountainous character, but well watered with lakes and rivers; and the soil, in most parts is very good and fertile: even in those places where the bogs and morasses have been drained, there is good meadow ground. It produces corn and hemp, in great plenty. The cultivation of flax is so abundant as to afford nearly the whole supply of the great linen manufactures of the country; there are so many cattle that beef and butter are exported to foreign parts; and not only the English, but other ships, frequently come to be victualled here. The other commodities are hides, wool, tallow, wood, salt, honey, and wax. The commerce and manufactures have for many years been greatly on the increase: the staple branch of industry is the manufacture of fine linen cloth, which is brought to great perfection. This country is well situated for foreign trade on account of its many secure and commodious bays and harbours. Its principal lakes are Lough Lean, Lough Ern, Lough Neagh, and Lough Corrib; and its chief rivers are the Shannon, Liffey, Boyne, Suire, Nore, Barrow, Blackwater, and Lee. The mineral productions of Ireland, which were little known till of late, are now fast rising into importance. The mining companies recently formed are nearly all of them eminently successful: copper, lead, iron, antimony, and Molybdenum, are now obtained: and some of the mines are very productive. In the royalty of Glendalough, in the county of Wicklow, are two veins of rich lead ore, at one of which the lead is raised at an expense of £1. 6s. per ton, and within 12 fathoms two parallel veins, equally rich, were discovered in 1837. There are likewise productive collieries and quarries of marble, slate, and freestone; and numerous mineral springs, chiefly chalybeate. Formerly this kingdom had a parliament, which was subordinate to that of Great Britain; but, in 1800, it was deemed expedient for the welfare of Ireland that it should be united to great Britain. The two parliaments passed acts for that purpose, and the two kingdoms, at the commencement of 1801, were styled the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland: and 32 peers (four of them bishops) and 100 commoners of Ireland are elected to represent that country in the Imperial Parliament, assembled in England. The lord lieutenant of Ireland, as well as the council, are appointed from time to time, by the king. The country people in Ireland, are remarkably hospitable and very warm in all their affections. The peasantry in general, are however sunk in poverty and ignorance. Their diet consists chiefly of coarse bread, potatoes and buttermilk; the favourite liquor is whiskey (usquebaugh), a distillation from corn; and the rural cottage is a wretched hovel of mud. Education has been much neglected, and still continues to be discountenanced by the Catholic clergy. Great efforts have been made for some years past to remove this, chiefly by two societies established in Britain, who have under their patronage a great number of schools, in a highly prosperous state. The established religion is the same as in England, but the great majority of the people are Catholics. The latter were long excluded from all civil and military distinction. This system of intolerance, however, no longer exists; and there is reason to hope that Ireland will speedily occupy its proper rank among European nations, and that the British government will liberally encourage its growing literature, commerce, agriculture, and manufactures.

Ireland, New, a long narrow island of the Eastern seas, N. of New Britain, extending from N. W. to S. E. about 190 m. and in general very narrow. The natives are Papuas, who go entirely naked, smearing their faces, and powdering their heads with white clay; their huts have only an opening to crawl in on their hands and knees. Their canoes, however are neatly formed of a single tree, sometimes 90 feet long, and furnished with outriggers. See Britain, New.

Irjab, a town of Afghanistan, in Cabul, seated near a western branch of the Indus, 111 m. S. S. W. of Cabul.

Irken, or Irkien. See Yarken.

Irkutsk, the largest and least populous government of the Russian empire, comprising all the E. part of Siberia, from the Northern Ocean to the frontiers of Chinese Tartary, and from the boundaries of the government of Tobolsk to the Eastern Ocean. This large territory was gradually conquered and appropriated by the Russians, in their desultory excursion from Tobolsk. It is divided into four provinces of I kutsk, Nertchinek Yakutsk, and Okhotsk.

Irkutsk, a town of Siberia, capital of the government of the same name, and the see of a bishop. It is a place of considerable commercial importance, from the caravans passing through it which trade to China, and from its being the seat of supreme jurisdiction over eastern Siberia. There are several churches and other edifices of stone, and the wooden houses are large and convenient. The inhabitants are estimated at 12,000 It stands on the river Angara, near the lake Baikal, 90v m. E. S. E. of Tobolsk.

Iroquois. See Lawrence, St.

Irrawaddy, or Irabatty, a considerable river of Asia, which rises in Thibet, flows S. through the kingdom of Birmah and Pegu, and enters the bay of Bengal by several mouths. On its banks are produced great quantities of the finest teak timber, so much esteemed in ship-building. The principal market for this valuable timber is Rangoon, at the most eastern mouth of the river.

Irtysch, a river of Siberia, which issues from the lake Saisan, in Chinese Tartary, runs N. W. between the two countries above 300 m., then flows by Omak, Tobolsk, and Samarof, below which it joins the Ob.

Iroville, p.v. Muskingum Co. Ohio.

Irvine, a river of Scotland, in Ayrshire, which passes by Newmills and Kilmarnock to the town of Irvine, below which it enters the frith of Clyde.

Irvine, a borough of Scotland, in Ayrshire. The chief trade is the exporting of coals to Ireland. Here is a dock-yard, a large tan-work, and manufactures of carpets, muslins, silks, lawns, &c. It is seated near the mouth of the river Irvine, 10 m. N. of Ayr, and 24 S. W. of Glasgow.

Irwell, a river in Lancashire Eng., which rises above Bolton, flows thence to Manchester, and joins the Mersey, below Flinton.

Irwia, a county of Georgia bounding upon Florida. Pop. 1,180.

Is sur Tille, a town of France, in the department of Cote d'Or, seated on the Tille, 12 m. N. of Dijon.

Ischia, an island of Naples, 15 m. in circuit, lying 3 m. off the coast of Terra di Lavoro. It is mountainous; but abounds in minerals, sulphur fruits, and excellent wines. It was taken by a British and Sicilian force in 1807. Fresh water is scarce, and the rain is collected in cisterns. but the air is healthy, and there are several hot baths, on which accounts it is much resorted to by invalids.

Ischia, an episcopal city of Naples, capital of the above island, with a strong fort. It stands upon a rock, which is joined to the island by a bridge, and is like a pyramid of houses piled one upon another. At the end of the bridge, next the city, are iron gates, which open into a subterranean passage, through which the city is entered. Long. 14. 2. E., lat. 40. 41. N.

Isenburg, Upper, a principality of Germany, on the borders of Hanau, subject partly to Hesse-Cassel, partly to Hesse-Darmstadt. It is generally fertile, and contains 217 sq. m., and 47,500 inhabitants.

Isenburg, New, a small town in the foregoing principality, 3 m. S. of Frankfort on the Maine.

Iseo, a town of Italy, in Bresciano, on the S. E. side of a lake of the same name, 10 m. N. W. of Brescia.

Iser, a river of Bavaria, which rises on the confines of Tyrol, and, passing by Munich and Landshut, joins the Danube, between Straubing and Passau.

Iser, or Izar (Circle of), one of the modern divisions of Bavaria, bounded partly by the circles of the Regen and the Upper Danube, partly by the Austrian states. It comprises most of the southern part of the old duchy of Bavaria, and is divided into 26 districts; its chief town, Munich, being the capital of the kingdom. The S. is mountainous, and consequently cold: the N. forms a large plain, with few elevations, possessing great fertility. The principal rivers are the Inn, the Iser, and the Lech.

Iserre, a department of France, including part of the late province of Dauphiny. It is so named from a river, which rises in Savoy, crosses this department by Grenoble, Moirans, and St. Marcellin, and joins the Rhone above Valence. Grenoble is the capital.

Iserlohn, a town of Prussian Westphalia, in the county of Mark, with manufactures of iron, tin, velvets, silks, and stuffs. It is seated on the Buaren, 41 m. E. by N. of Dusseldorf.

Isernia, a town of Naples, in the Molise, at the foot of the Apennines. In 1805 it suffered much by an earthquake, 12 m. W. of Molise.

Isigny, a town of France, in the department of Calvados, 15 m. W. by N. of Bayeux.

Isinglass, r. N. H. flows into the Cocheco

Isis. See Thames.

Isla, or Ila, an island of Scotland, one of the Hebrides, to the S. W. of Jura, from which it is separated by a narrow channel, called the Sound of Isla. It is 21 m. long, and 15 broad. On the E. side the surface is hilly, and covered with heath, but the greater part of the island is flat, and, when uncultivated, covered with a fine green sward. In the centre of the island is Loch Finlagan, about 3 m. in circuit, with an islet of the same name in the middle where the great lord of the isles resided, but the palaces and offices are now in ruins. Isla has mines of iron, lead, copper, emery, quicksilver, and black-lead; with immense stores of limestone, marl, coral, and shell-sand, for manure. Much flax is raised here, a great number of cattle fed, and a large quantity of whiskey distilled. The principal village is Bowmore, which has a convenient harbour and quay.

Islamabad, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal, capital of the country of Chittagong; situate on the Currumpooly, near its entrance into the bay of Bengal. Long. 91. 55. E., lat. 22. 22. N.

Island Creek, a township of Jefferson Co. Ohio.

Islands, Bay of, a bay of New Zealand, at the N. extremity of the most northern of the two islands that go under that name. In 1772 M. Dufresne Marion, with two French sloops, put into this bay, and with 28 of his crew, was murdered by the natives.

Ile Adam, a town of France, in the department of Seine-et-Oise, seated on the Oise, 20 m. N. by W. of Paris.

Ile aux Noix, an island in Sorel river. Lower Canada, about 10 m. from Lake Champlain.

Ile Bouchard, a town of France, in the department of Indre-et-Loire, surrounded by the Vienne, 21 m. S. S. W. of Tours.

Ile Dieu, a small island of France, 14 m. from the coast of Poitou. It was taken by the English in 1795, but soon after evacuated.

Ile de France. See France Isle of.

Ile Jourdain, a town of France, in the department of Gers, seated on an island in the river Save, 8 m. N. of Lombes.

Isleborough, a township of Waldo Co. Me. Pop. 674.

Isle of Wight, a county of the E. District of Virginia. Pop. 10,417. Smithfield is the chief town. See also Wight.

Isles of Shoals, a cluster of small islands near the coast of N. Hampshire, between Newburyport and Portsmouth, belonging to New Hampshire and Maine. The New Hampshire portion constitutes the township of Gosport. They are barren heaps of sand and rocks, with hardly a green sod upon them, yet were once populous and wealthy. The inhabitants live solely by fishing, and the Isle of Shoals Dun Fish are well known as the best cured cod in the world. They have now about 100 inhabitants, and a lighthouse has been recently built here. A cave is still shewn upon one of them in which one of the female inhabitants secreted herself when the islands were invaded by the Indians. The celebrated Captain Smith discovered these islands, and they were formerly called Smith's Isles. The New England Sea Serpent, that mysterious monster, whose full length portrait has been shadowed forth in the narration of many a wondering spectator, but whose absolute non-entity is still maintained by the perversity of scepticism—was accustomed to make these shores his favourite resort. Recently his visits, like the portentous humps upon his back, have been few and far between.

Isleworth, a village in Middlesex, Eng. seated on the Thames, 9 m. W. of London. Here are many elegant villas; and near it is Sion-house, the magnificent seat of the duke of Northumberland.

Islington, a large village in Middlesex, Eng. N. of London, to which it is now contiguous. The New River is received at the S. W. end of it into a large reservoir, whence its water is conveyed in pipes, to all parts of the metropolis. Near this is a spring of chalybeate water, called New Tunbridge Wells. To the E. of the town is a manufacture of white lead.

Islip, p.t. Suffolk Co. N. Y. on Long Island. Pop. 1,653.

Ismail, a strong town of European Turkey, in Bessarabia. The Russians took it by storm in 1790; and it is said that the long siege, and the capture did not cost them fewer than 20,000 men. The brave garrison merited the highest honours, but they were massacred by the Russians: and the city was abandoned to the fury of the brutal soldiery. Ismail is seated on the N. side of the Danube, 140 m. S. by W. of Bender.

Ismid, a town of Asia Minor, on the side of a hill overlooking the gulf of Nicomedia. Long. 29. 34. E., lat. 40. 39. N.

Imik, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, and a Greek archbishop's see. It is the ancient Nice, famous for the general council held here in 325. Nothing remains of its ancient splendour but an aqueduct. The Jews inhabit the greater part of it; and silk forms the principal article of trade. It is seated in a country fertile in corn and wine, 60 m. S. E. of Constantinople.

Isny, a town of Wurtemberg, with an abbey, called St. George, whose abbot was a state of the empire. It is seated on the Isny, 18 m. N. E. of Lindau.

Isordskick, or Krocza, a town of Servia, 14 m. S. E. of Belgrade.

Isbahan, a city of Persia, long the capital of the Persian monarchy, is situated in the province of Irak, and was formerly celebrated as the finest city in the East. It stands in the middle of a plain, surrounded on all sides by mountains at 8 m. distance, which rise gradually in the form of an amphitheatre. There is no river except a small one called Sanderut, which supplies almost all the houses with water, and over which are several fine bridges. There are 160 mosques, 1,800 large caravanseras, and above 260 public baths. The streets are not paved, but are generally clean, on account of the dryness of the air; for it seldom rains or snows here. The inhabitants are computed at not more than 200,000, having been greatly depopulated by the intestine broils and civil wars with which this kingdom has been almost torn to pieces. This city is the emporium of the inland commerce of Persia, being the medium of communication with India, Cabul, and Turkey. It is 265 m. N. E. of Bassorah, and 300 S. of the Caspian Sea.

Israel's River, N. H. a beautiful stream formed by the cataracts which descend from the White Mountains. It falls into the Connecticut at Lancaster.

Issel. See Yssel.

Issengeaux, a town of France, in the department of Upper Loire, 17 m. N. E. of Puy.

Issequibo, or Essequibo, a settlement extending along the banks of a river of the same name, in Dutch Guiana, and contiguous to that of Demerara, from which it is separated by the river Borasierrri. It was taken from the Dutch during the late wars, and was finally ceded to Britain in 1814. It is extremely fertile, and is well cultivated. The Issequibo River is 20 m. wide at its mouth, and more than 300 in length.

Issoudun, a town of France, in the department of Indre, with a brisk trade in wood, cattle, cloth, hats, and stockings. It is seated on the Theole, 17 m. S. W. of Bourges, and 135 S. of Paris.

Istapa, a town of Mexico, in the province of Culiacan, 40 m. E. by S. of Culiacan.

Istria, a peninsula of Italy, between the bay of Trieste and the Quarnaro Isles, bounded by Friuli on the W. and Carniola on the N., being 200 m. in circumference. The air is unwholesome, especially near the coast; but the soil is fertile. Oil and wine are abundant, and there are some productive quarries of fine marble. The chief riches of the country, however, consists in its vast and valuable forests. One part of it belonged formerly to the Venetians; but the whole was ceded to the emperor by the treaty of Presburg, in 1805. In 1809 it fell into the hands of Napoleon; but was re-conquered by the Austrians in 1814, and now forms the southern division of Austrian Illyria. The inhabitants (about 140,000) are chiefly occupied in agriculture, rearing bees, fishing, and the manufacture of silk, leather, tallow, and salt.

Italy, one of the finest and most celebrated countries of Europe, lying between 7. and 10. E. long., and between 37. and 46. N. lat. On the N. N. W., and N. E., it is bounded by France, Switzerland, the country of the Grisons, and Germany; on the E. by the Adriatic Sea; and on the S. and W. by the Mediterranean; its figure bearing some resemblance to a boot. Its length from Aosta at the foot of the Alps, in Savoy, to the utmost verge of Calabria, is about 600 m. but its breadth is very unequal, being in some places nearly 400 m. in others not above 25 or 30. It was formerly the seat of the Roman empire, and, afterwards, of that more astonishing usurpation, the dominion of the pope. In the middle ages the kingdom of Lombardy and that of Naples held the two extremes, and the Ecclesiastical and Tuscan states occupied the centre. In more modern times the northern part became divided into a great number of states, differing considerable in their extent and importance. By the treaty of Campo Formio, in 1797, the Venetian territories to the E. and N. of the river Adige were ceded to Austria; and the remainder of the Venetian states, with the duchies of Modena, Milan, and Mantua, the principality of Massa, and the three legations of Ferrara, Bologna, and Romagna, in the pope's dominions, were erected into a government by the French, and called the Cisalpine Republic. This republic was overturned in 1799, but restored after the battle of Marengo, in 1800. In 1802 it received a new constitution, under the name of the Italian Republic, and Bonaparte, then first consul of France, was elected president. In 1805 the Italian Republic was erected into a kingdom, and the emperor of France assumed the title of king of Italy. In December following, the Austrian part of the Venetian states was added to its territories, by the treaty of Presburg. The kingdom was divided into departments, and the city of Milan was the capital. But the subsequent changes which took place in Europe again deranged the political situation of this country. The kingdom of Italy was overturned; and the country is now divided into the following states:—The Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, the kingdom of Sardinia, the States of the Church, or pope's dominions, the Two Sicilies, the grand duchy of Tuscany, the states of Modena, the states of Parma, the duchy of Lucca, and the republic of San Marino.

Italy, as to climate, has been divided into four separate regions. The first of these embraces the basin of the Po, extending about 260 m. in length, and 150 in its greatest breadth; being bounded by the Alps and Apennines on the N. W. and S., and open to the Adriatic on the E. Here the atmosphere is uniformly serene and bright; and, being tempered by refreshing breezes from the adjacent heights, the climate is altogether one of the most salubrious and delightful in the whole world. The second region includes the Tuscan and Roman territories, being screened on the N. by the Apennines, and more exposed to the heats of summer than to the rigors of the winter. Frost and snow are here experienced; but the temperature is sufficient to mature the orange, the fig, and similar fruits. The third district contains Campania Felix, and its dependencies, where the vegetable treasures of nature are also found in the greatest perfection, the air uniformly mild and serene, and a peculiar glow of beauty pervades the landscape. The fourth division extends from the Apennines to the Adriatic, and embraces the southern districts of the peninsula. Here the aloe, the palm, and other productions of a southern ern climate flourish; but, when the sirocco blows, the heats are overcoming to a stranger from almost any other part of Europe. The climate of Italy also experiences much diversity from elevation and local circumstances. The general aspect of the country is highly beautiful and picturesque. The Alps and Apennines diversify this peninsula with almost every possible combination of hill and valley, rivers, lakes, and romantic scenery. Northern Italy is broken into bold and rugged acclivities by the former, from the southern face of which descend the streams that form the Po and various other classical rivers. Towards the southern extremity of Italy, the Apennines diverge into two branches, one of which advances eastward to Capo de Leuca, and the other southward to the straits of Messina. Several detached mountains, among which is the celebrated Vesuvius, here overhang the gulf of Naples, and discharge their liquid fires into its waters. The Apennines are, in many parts, clothed with trees to their summits; in other places they are more precipitous, and attain the altitude of ice and snow. The principal rivers are the Po, Tiber, Adige, Brenta, Piave, and Tagliamento, and there are several fine lakes, as the Maggiore, Lugano, Como, Garda, Perugia, Bracciano, and Celano. The soil, in general, is very fertile. It produces a great variety of wines, and the best oil in Europe; excellent silk in abundance; corn of all sorts, but not in such plenty as in other countries; oranges, lemons, citrons, pomegranates, almonds, raisins, sugar, figs, peaches, apricots, pears, apples, filberts, chestnuts, &c. The olive is one of the most valuable productions of Italy. The Tuscans were the first that exported olive oil in any quantity, on which account it is still called, Florence oil. There is something peculiarly mild and graceful in the appearance of the olive tree, even apart from its associations. The leaves are somewhat like those of the willow, only they are more soft and delicate. The flowers are as delicate as the leaves. They come in little spikes from buds between the leaf stalks and spikes. The matured-wood of the olive is hard and compact though rather brittle, and has the pith obliterated like box. Its colour is reddish, and it takes a fine gloss, on which accounts the ancients carved it into statues of their gods. The moderns make it into snuff boxes and other trinkets. This country also yields good pastures, abounds with cattle, sheep, goats, buffaloes, wild boars, mules, and horses. The forests are well stored with game; and the mountains have not only mines of iron, lead, alum, sulphur, marble of all sorts, alabaster, jasper, porphyry, &c., but also gold and silver, with a great variety of aromatic herbs, trees, shrubs, and evergreens. Wine, oil, perfumes, fruits, and silks, are the principal articles of exportation; and great sums of money are expended by travellers in the purchase of pictures, curiosities, relics, antiquities, &c. No country has produced better, politicians, historians, poets, musicians, painters, and sculptors; that is, since the revival of the arts and sciences, exclusive of those of ancient times. The Italians are generally well proportioned; but of their complexion they cannot boast. With respect to dress they follow the fashions of the countries on which they border, or to which they are subject. They are very affable, courteous, ingenious, sober, and ready-witted; but extremely jealous, vindictive, lascivious, ceremonious, and superstitious. Masquerades, gaming, horse-races, and conversazioni or assemblies, are the chief diversions of the Italians, excepting religious exhibitions, in which they are pompous beyond all other nations. The established religion is the Roman Catholic, but all other sects are now tolerated: the number of archbishops in the whole country is 38; and that of the suffragans indefinite, as may be truly added of the inferior ecclesiastics. Their language, a corruption of the Latin, is remarkable for its smoothness, and is said to be spoken in its greatest purity at Florence. Further particulars of this country will be found under the names of its particular divisions, as Naples, &c.

Jaffa, anciently called Joppa, a town of Asia, in Palestine, situated near the coast of the Mediterranean, with a small citadel. It was formerly a celebrated city, and is frequently mentioned in the Scriptures. It has long been inhabited by Turks and Arabs, with a mixture of Geeks, Maronites, and Armenians. The houses are small and surrounded with the ruins of the ancient walls and towers. The Franks, Greeks, and Armenians have small convents for the reception of pilgrims of different nations. The principal commerce is in grain, particularly rice from Egypt. Jaffa was laid waste in the crusades, and afterwards destroyed by an earthquake. In profane history it is said to be the place whence Perseus delivered Andromeda. It was taken by the French, under Bonaparte, in February 1799, but they held possession 40 days only. It is 12 m. N. W. of Gaza, and 33 W. of Jerusalem.

Jaffna, a town of Ceylon, capital of Jaffnapatam, whence are exported great quantities of tobacco, and some elephants, which are accounted the most docile of any in the world. The Dutch took it from the Portuguese in 1658; and it was taken by the English in 1795. It is seated on a river navigable for large boats, 100 m. N. of Candy. Long. 80. 10. E., lat. 9. 45. N.

Jaffnapatam, a district in the N. part of Ceylon fertile in fruit and vegetables, and said to be the most populous and healthy in the island. Jamagorod, a town of Russia, in the government of Petersburg, with a strong fort, seated on the Jama, 12 m. N. E. of Narva.

Jamaica, the most considerable and valuable of the British West India islands, discovered by Columbus, in 1494. It lies 30 leagues W. of St. Domingo, nearly the same distance S. of Cuba, and is of an oval figure, 150 miles long and 40 broad, containing 4,000,000 acres. An elevated ridge, called the Blue Mountains, runs lengthwise from E. to W., whence numerous rivers take their rise on both sides; and though none of them are navigable for barges, yet the sugars are carried upon many of them in canoes from the remote plantations to the seaside: some of them run under ground for a considerable space, particularly the Cobre and Pedra. The year is distinguished into two seasons, the wet and dry; but the rains are not so frequent as formerly, which is supposed to be owing to the cutting down of the woods. About nine in the morning it is so intolerably hot that it would be difficult to live, if the easterly breeze did not rise to cool the air. Sometimes the nights are pretty cool, and there are great dews, which are deemed unwholesome, especially to new comers. The months of July, August, and September, are called the hurricane months, because then they are the most frequent; and there is lightning almost every night. The best houses are generally built low, on account of the hurricanes and earthquakes; and the negroes' huts, made of reeds, will hold only two or three persons. The valleys are embellished with plantations, so well laid out, and with such a variety of fruit-trees, as to make the country look like a paradise. Horned cattle, hogs, and sheep are plentiful; but the servants generally feed upon Irish salt-beef, and the negroes have herrings and salt-fish. The general produce of this island is sugar, rum, molasses, ginger, cotton, indigo, pimento, cocoa, coffee, several kinds of wood, and medicinal drugs. It has some tobacco, but not good, and used only by the negroes; also maize, Guinea corn, and peas of various kinds, with variety of roots. Fruits are in great plenty, such as oranges, lemons, shaddocks, citrons, pomegranates, pine-apples, prickly-pears, melons, pompions, guavas, and many others. The plantain which Jamaica produces in abundance, is one of the most agreeable and nutritious vegetables in the world. It grows in a herbaceous form about 4 feet in height, and produces clusters of fruit filled with a luscious sweet pulp. The banana is very similar to the plantain but not so sweet. Jamaica can boast of a botanical garden, containing the rarest collection of curious trees and plants, perhaps in the world. The whole island is divided into three counties, Middlesex, Surry, and Cornwall, and these into 20 parishes, or districts, 6 towns, and 27 villages.

The legislature is composed of the governor, a council of 12 nominated by the crown, and a house of assembly consisting of 43 members elected by the freeholders. The first settlement on this island was made, in 1509, by the Spaniards, who were cruel to the natives; but it was taken by the English in 1656, and a colony soon after formed by disbanded soldiers from the parliamentary army, who were governed by military laws till the restoration. The tranquillity of this colony has been occasionally disturbed by the inroads of the Maroons, or original natives, who, however, were completely quelled in 1796; and since that period the colony has rapidly increased in importance. There is an ecclesiastical establishment in this island, consisting of 19 benefited clergymen, but the state of religion has long been deplorable. Within the last few years, however, considerable efforts have been made by missionaries and others; and though the principal men of the island have manifested much opposition, yet these efforts have already been crowned with very considerable success. The government of Jamaica is one of the richest places, next to that of Ireland, in the disposal of the crown: the standing salary is 2,500l., and the assembly commonly vote as much more to the governor, which, with other perquisites, make it little less than 10,000l. a year. Spanish Town is the seat of government, but Kingston is the capital.

Japan, an extensive empire in the most eastern part of Asia, extending from long. 131. to 142. E. and from lat. 30. to 41. N. It consists of three large islands (the superficial extent of which is estimated at 90,000 sq. m.), and several smaller islands. The whole empire is divided into seven principal districts, which are subdivided into 70 provinces; and the pop. is in proportion to extent, deemed equal to that of China. It is the richest country in the world for gold; there are also rich silver mines, and fine copper is the main source of the wealth of many provinces. It produces a great deal of rice, which is the principal article of subsistence; millet, wheat, and barley, are also cultivated to a small extent. Turnips, carrots, melons, cucumbers, &c., all grow spontaneously. Cedars are common, and so large that they are proper for the masts of ships and columns for temples. The mulberry tree, the laurel, the tree shrub, and camphire tree are also common; but the most remarkable is the varnish tree (rhus vernix), the juice of which is used to varnish, or (as we call it) japan their furniture. The rocks and most barren places are cultivated and produce a variety of fruits, plants, and roots. The woods and forests, and long ridges of mountains, with which the country is intersected, produce good pasturage, and are stocked with deer, oxen, buffaloes, and a few horses; but there are no sheep nor goats. Here are large quantities of fine porcelain, silk, and skins, as also red pearls, which are not in less esteem than the white. The Japanese are of a yellowish complexion all over; their heads are in general large, their necks short and their hair which is naturally black and thick, is rendered shining by the use of oils; their eyes are small, of dark brown colour, and sunk deep in the head, and the eyelids form in the great angle of the eye a deep furrow, which discriminates them from other nations; their eyebrows are also placed somewhat higher; and their noses though not flat, are thick and short. They are naturally ingenious, and have a high character for honesty and veracity. Their common drinks are all hot;

they uncover their feet out of respect, are fond of black teeth, and get on horseback on the left side. Their houses are of wood, coloured white, and never exceed two stories in height. The interior is divided into apartments at pleasure, by moveable partitions sliding in grooves. They have neither tables, beds, nor chairs, but sit and lie on carpets and mats. The dress consists of trousers, and a loose robe of silk or cotton, fastened by a girdle the number being increased according to the coldness of the weather: stockings are not used; and the shoes are commonly of rice straw. The mathematical and physical sciences are yet in their infancy, but are highly esteemed among them; and they have several schools at different places, in which are taught arithmetic, rhetoric, poetry, history, and astronomy. Some of their arts and manufactures even surpass those of Europe. They formerly carried on a considerable trade with the neighbouring countries; but now all communications are forbidden, except with the Chinese and Dutch; and with them only at the port of Nangasaki. The merchandise brought by the Dutch; are spices, sugar, linen and woollen cloth, elephants' teeth, and haberdashery wares; for which they receive gold, silver, copper, rice, tea, fine porcelain, cabinets, and other japanned and lackered wares. Japan was formerly divided into a great many small kingdoms, which still retain their ancient names, but they were at length swallowed up in one, to which all the rest are become either subject or tributary. The tributary princes, amounting to between 50 and 60, are vested with the regal dignity, and are absolute in their respective territories; but they are entirely subject to the emperor, who can depose, or even condemn them to death, if he thinks proper. The laws are extremely severe and cruel: and the people are doubly slaves, first to their own princes and then to the emperor, who has power of life and death over them all. Anciently the emperor was likewise sovereign pontiff, under the title of of Dairo, and in fact worshipped by all his subjects; but in the civil wars which occurred on the minority of one of them, in 1150, one of the competitors for the crown assumed the ecclesiastical government, retaining the same title; while the other, who ruled in civil affairs, was called Cubo. From that time the dairo has only been at the head of religious matters, while the cubo or secular emperor bears an absolute dominion over all civil and military affairs. The former still lives in great state and grandeur at Meaco; and the latter pays him a kind of homage, as if he acted only as his deputy or viceroy; but, in reality the cubo is now the real monarch of Japan, and the dairo only as his high priest. The Japanese are as fabulous as the Chinese in the antiquity of their empire; but the certain period begins with the hereditary succession of the ecclesiastical emperors, from the year 660 before the christian epoch. The religion of the country is paganism; but there are two different sects. There was once a great number of christians in different parts of the empire; but, in 1638 they underwent great persecutions and all who professed Christianity were either put to death or forced to revert back to paganism. The capital of the empire is Jeddo. Japara, a sea-port on the N. coast of the island of Java, with a good harbour. It was the capital of a considerable kingdom, till the Dutch made themselves masters of it; and now they have a colony here, and a considerable trade. 253 m. E. by S. of Batavia. Long. 110. 45. E., lat. 6. 30. S.

Jaquemel, a town of St. Domingo, on a bay of its name, on the S. coast, 32 m. S. S. W. of Port au Prince.

Jaroslaw, a town of Poland, in Red Russia, with a strong citadel. A battle was gained here, by the Swedes, in 1656, after which they took the town. It is included in the kingdom of Galicia, and seated on the Saine, 55 m. W. of Lemberg. Long. 22. 43. E., lat. 50. 4. N.

Jaroslawi, or Jaroslaw, a government of Russia, formerly a province of the government of Moscow. Its territorial extent is estimated at about 14,000 sq. m. and its inhabitants at 800,000. It is divided into 10 circles, exclusive of the level called the Steppes of Jaroslaw. The principal rivers are the Wolga, the Schekna, and Mologa. The chief trade is in cattle and wood. The capital, of the same name, is a large commercial place, and a bishop's see, with numerous manufactures. It is seated on the Wolga, 145 m. N. N. E. of Moscow.

Jasomiz, a town of Hither Pomerania, seated on the Oder, 10 m. N. of Stettin.

Jaques, a town of Persia, in the province of Mecran, which gives name to a cape in the gulf of Ormus. Long. 57. 4. E., lat. 55. 40. N.

Jassy, a town of European Turkey, capital of Moldavia, and an archbishop's see, with a trade in flax, corn, hides, wool, wax, honey, tallow, and canvass, large quantities of which are made in the town and sent to Constantinople. In 1763 it was destroyed by fire; it was subsequently rebuilt and well fortified; but in 1788 the fortifications were demolished, excepting a small fort. The inhabitants are estimated at 12,000. It has been several times taken in the wars between the Turks and the Russians or Austrians. It is seated on the Pruth, 170 m. N. N. E. of Bucharest, and 370 N. of Constantinople.

Jauer, a town of Silesia, capital of a principality of the same name, with a citadel, and a large square, surrounded by piazzas. It has manufactures of woolen and cotton, and a trade in flax and yarn. It is seated in a fine country on the rivulet Jauer, 35 m. W. by S. of Breslau. Long. 16. 23. E., lat. 51. 2. N.

Jaulmiz, a town of France, in the department of Vienne, 6 m. N. of Poitiers.

Jauru, a river of Brazil, in Matto-Grosso, which rises in the plains of Paraxis, in long. 58.

30. W., lat. 14. 42. S., and, after a long S. and S. E. course falls into the Paraguay in lat. 16. 24. S. At its mouth is erected a beautiful pyramid of marble, bearing inscriptions commemorative of the treaty between Spain and Portugal, which defined the boundaries of their respective territories. On its banks are extensive salt-pits, from which the province of Matto-Grosso derives large quantities of salt.

Java, an island of the E. Indies, lying to the S. of Borneo, and separated at its W. end from Sumatra, by the strait of Sunda. It is sometimes called Great Java, to distinguish it from Bali, by some named Little Java; and is 640 m. in length, and of various breadth, extending from 105. to 116. E. long., and 6. to 9. S. lat. The land is low, and in some places marshy, near the shore, which renders the air unhealthy; but it rises in a gradual slope towards the interior of the country, admitting in its ascent every variety of situation and verdure. Rice is the staple production of the island, and is exported in considerable quantity. Sugar, pepper, cotton, and coffee, are produced in abundance. Indigo, of a very superior quality, is also cultivated; and wheat, barley, oats, and Bengal grain, thrive well, and might be produced in great abundance, if due attention were bestowed on their culture. The N. coast has a great many commodious creeks, bays, harbours, and towns, with many little islands near the shore. The inhabitants are chiefly Javanese; next to these are the Malays; and in the sea-ports a considerable number of Chinese are settled. The Javanese inhabit all the interior parts of the island, and are in general the cultivators of the soil. They are described as a barbarous, proud and fierce people, of a brown complexion, short, coal-black hair, large cheeks, small eyes, and large eyebrows. The men are very robust and strong limbed; the women are small, but of pleasing countenance, and in some districts they are really beautiful. The men wear a piece of calico, which is the principal manufacture of the island, wrapt two or three times round their middle; and the women wear them from their armpits down to their knees; but all other parts are bare. The men have two or three wives, and several concubines, according to their circumstances. The Javanese appear, from remains of temples and inscriptions, to be of Hindoo descent, and their language is quite distinct from that of the Malays: but the professed religion of both is Mahomedism. The Malays principally inhabit along the coast. They are not so well featured as the Javanese; but the men are often very muscular and well made. They are generally indolent, but at the same time restless, vindictive, and treacherous. The Chinese are distinguished by their habits of industry, and generally by their wealth. Many of them carry on a considerable trade with their native country, and the several islands of the eastern archipelago. They intermarry with the Javanese and Malays, and purchase female slaves for wives and concubines. This island has very high mountains, particularly the Pepper Mountain on the S. side; it has, likewise, impassable forests and wildernesses; but to the N., between Batavia and Bantam, is a very populous country, full of rice fields, and plenty of salt and pepper, besides most sorts of fruits proper to the climate. Here are also plenty of hogs, bees, and sheep, with other tame animals; and likewise fowl, wild and tame, in great abundance. In the woods are large tigers, rhinoceroses, and other wild beasts; and in the rivers are crocodiles. The Babiroussa is a sort of hog, yet instead of bristles he is covered with a soft short hair like wool. Herds of them are found together and are easily discovered in consequence of their strong odour. Their enormous tusks are of a beautiful ivory, smoother and finer than that of the elephant. The serene season is from May till November; and then the rains begin, which lay the low grounds under water, kill the insects, and continue till March, when they commence sowing, and in July the sugar and rice begin to ripen; but September and October are the best months for all sorts of fruits. Java has a river which rises in the mountains, and, dividing itself into many branches, waters the circumjacent country: these afterwards reunite, and pass through Batavia, dividing it into two parts. For more than a century Java was under the dominion of the Dutch. In 1811 it was captured by the British, under Sir Samuel Auchmuty, and many important improvements were adopted in its internal administration. Government also did much to promote agricultural improvements, and the country prospered and enjoyed tranquillity. Since it has been restored to the Dutch. They appear, however, to have reverted to their former wretched system, as they have been engaged in quelling insurrections, which there is little doubt were provoked by their arbitrary and vexatious exactions. Batavia is the capital.

Jaxt, one of the four circles or departments of Wurtemberg, deriving its name from the river Jaxt, having Baden on the W. and Bavaria on the E. It comprises a superficial area of above 14,000 square m., with a pop. of 260,000: the name was formerly given to a province not half the extent.

Jean de Loens, St., a town of France, department of Cote d'Or, celebrated for the bravery of its inhabitants, in opposing the imperial count Gallas, at the head of a numerous army, in 1835. It is seated on the Saone, 16 m. S. S. E. of Dijon.

Jeah de Lux, St., a town of France, department of Lower Pyrenees, the last next Spain with a harbour. It owes its opulence to the cod and whale fishery, and is seated on a small river, near the Bay of Biscay, 14 m. S. W. of Bayonne. Long. 1. 40. W., lat. 43. 25. N.

Jean de Maurienne, St., a town of Savoy, capital of the province of Maurienne, and a bishop's see. It is seated on the river Arc, 25 m. E. N. E. of Grenoble. Long. 6. 20. E., lat. 45. 17. N.

Jean de Pied de Port, St., a town of France, department of Lower Pyrenees, defended by a citadel, upon an eminence, at the entrance of those passages, or defiles, in the Pyrenees, which, in this country, are called Ports. It is seated on the river Nive, 20 m. S. S. E. of Bayonne, and 30 N. E. of Pampeluna.

Jed, a river of Scotland, in Roxburghshire which rises on the borders of England, and joins the Teviot, a little below Jedburg. On its banks are several large caverns, which were the hiding places of ancient border-warriors.

Jedburgh a borough of Scotland, capital of Roxburghshire. Here is the ruin of a fine abbey, part of which has been made the parish church. A variety of woollen manufactures are carried on here, and the vicinity is noted for its orchards. It is situated on the Jed, near its conflux with the Teviot, 42 m. S. E. of Edinburgh.

Jedo, or Jeddo, the capital of the empire of Japan, situate on the S. E. side of Niphon, the largest of the Japanese Islands. The city has neither walls nor ramparts, is 9 m. in length, and 6 in breadth, and contains 1,000,000 inhabitants. The houses are built of earth, and boarded on the out side, to prevent the rains from destroying the walls. In every street is an iron gate, which is shut up in the night and a kind of custom-house, or magazine, for merchandize. The imperial palace is surrounded by walls and ditches, with drawbridges, forming of itself a considerable town, in the middle of the city. Where the emperor resides are three towers, nine stories high, each covered with plates of gold; and the hall of audience is supported by pillars of massy gold. Near the palace are several others, where the relations of the emperor live. The empress has a palace of her own, and there are twenty small ones for the concubines. Besides which, all the princes of the empire, who are obliged to make it their residence during half the year, have each a palace in the city, with a handsome garden. The houses of the common class are nothing but ground floor, the rooms parted by folding screens, so that they can be made larger or smaller at pleasure. Jedo is seated in a plain at the head of a fine bay, and a river, which passes through it supplies several canals. Long. 139. 30. E., lat. 36. 10. N.

Jersey, an island in the English Channel, 18 m from the coast of Normandy in France, and 94 S of Portland in Dorsetshire. It is subject to the English, but is still governed by the ancient Norman laws. It is 30 m in circumference and difficult of access, on account of rocks, sands, and the forts erected for its defence. It produces excellent butter and honey, and the S. part of the island is nearly covered with apple trees for cider. The commerce of Jersey extends to almost every European nation and also to America. It exports to England great quantities of cider; also fruits, potatoes and cattle; and in return imports corn, flour, seeds, coals, cloth, linen, glass, &c. A number of ships are engaged in the Newfoundland fishery. In 1812, 59 vessels, altogether of 6000 tons burden, and navigated by 550 seamen, belonged to the island.

Jerusalem, an ancient and famous town of Asia, formerly capital of Judea. It was taken by Nebuchadnezzar in the 11th year of Zedekiah, when the Jews were led captive to Babylon. It was afterwards taken by the Romans, and destroyed, together with the temple, 70 years after the birth of Christ, after sustaining one of the most remarkable sieges in history. The emperor Adrian built a new city near its ruins. It was taken by the Persians in 614, and by the Saracens in 636. In 1099 it was retaken by the Crusaders, who founded a new kingdom, which lasted 88 years, under 9 kings. Saladin, king of Egypt and Syria, obtained possession of it in 1187. The Turks who drove away the Saracens in 1217, have retained it ever since, and call it El Kods, that is, the Holy City. It is now inhabited by Turks, Arabs, Jews and Christians. It stands on a high rock with steep ascents on every side except to the N. It is almost surrounded with valleys encompassed with mountains, so that it seems to stand in the middle of an amphitheatre. The principal object of veneration is the church of the holy sepulchre, a very handsome building, 3,000 feet long and nearly 200 broad. It is supposed to comprehend within these limits the scene of all the great events of the crucifixion, entombment, and resurrection of Christ. The chapel is cut out of the rock, and lamps are kept constantly burning in it. The whole is covered with white marble, both within and without; and on the outside there are 10 fine columns of the same. It is covered with a platform, the middle of which forms a small dome six feet in height, covered with lead, and supported by 12 columns of porphyry, placed by pairs on the platform, and forming 6 arches, which have 3 lamps under each. Before the gate of the sepulchre is a silver lamp, so large that 2 men cannot fathom it. On Good Friday, all the parts of our Saviour's passion are solemnized in this church.

Pilgrims flock hither from various parts, and the inhabitants accommodate them with lodging and provisions, which is their chief business, and a bashaw, with a guard of janissaries, always resides here to protect them from the insults of the Arabs. The manufactures of Jerusalem are almost confined to one branch, that of beads, crosses, shells, and other objects supposed to derive their sanctity from their local origin. These articles receive a species of benediction in the church of the sepulchre; and they are bought even by those who are most sensible of their insignificance, as they form acceptable presents to all the inhabitants of Greek and Catholic countries. Jerusalem is politically included in the pachalic of Damascus; but the surrounding territory forms a kind of independent district. 112 m. S. W. of Damascus, 45 from the Mediterranean. Long. 35. 20. E., lat. 31. 47. N.

Jerusalem, p.v. Ontario Co. N. Y. Also a village in Queens Co. N. Y. on Long Island. Also a village of Southampton Co. Va.

Jesi, a town of Italy, in the states of the church, seated on the river Esino, 10 m. W. S. W. of Ancona.

Jessamine, a county of Kentucky, on Kentucky river. Pop. 9,961. Nicholasville is the capital.

Jesselmore, a town of Hindoostan, in a district of the same name, in the province of Agimere, governed by an independent chief. 70 m. W. by N. of Bickaneer.

Jesso, a large island, lying between those of Nippon and Saghalien. It is 150 m. in length, and from 80 to 220 in breadth: the narrow part is in the S., towards Nippon. It is full of woods; and the natives, who live by fishing and hunting, are strong, robust, savage, and slovenly, when compared to the Japanese. Here are some Japanese colonies, and the island is generally deemed subject to Japan; but it may be rather considered as a foreign conquest than as a part of the civilized empire. Matsmai is the capital. The S. point is in long. 142. 30. W., lat. 40. 50. N.

Jessore, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal, capital of a district of the same name. It is seated on the river Boirub, and on the high road from Calcutta to Dacca. It was at this spot that the pestilential cholera broke out in 1817, which from that time till 1832 ravaged a great part of Europe and nearly the whole of Asia.

Jever, a small district of Germany, situated between East Friesland and the duchy of Oldenburg. Though surrounded by Westphalia, it was never included in any circle of the empire. It was ceded to Oldenburg in 1814.

Jever, a town of Germany, in the grand duchy of Oldenburg, 34 m. N. by W. of Oldenburg.

Jidda, a sea-port of Arabia Felix, on the Red Sea, in a barren, sandy district, destitute of fresh water. A very considerable trade is carried on here, this city being a mart between Egypt and India. The ships from Suez seldom proceed further than this port, and those from India are not suffered to advance to Suez. The English are permitted to trade here; but, in consequence of the numerous exactions to which they are subjected, the trade has greatly declined. By the treaty with the Porte the duty is 5 per cent., but under various pretences it is raised to 12. 34 m. W. S. W. of Mecca, of which it is the port. Long 39. 15. E., lat. 21. 29. N.

Jimbala, a town of Negroland, capital of an island so called, which is formed by two branches of the Niger that separate at leaving the lake Dibbie, and unite again about 15 m. from Tombuctoo. The town is a resting place for traders between Tombuctoo and the western parts of the country. It stands on the W. branch of the Niger, 80 m. S. W. of Tombuctoo. Long. 0. 16. E., lat. 16. 4. N.

Jionpour, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a circle of the same name, in Allahabad. It is seated on the Goomty; and not far from the conflux of that river with the Ganges is the fort of Jionpour, on a high bank commanding the bridge over the Goomty. This place was at one time the seat of an empire; and sultan Shirki built the great masjid, or mausoleum, which is still remaining. The stone bridge over the Goomty consists of sixteen pointed arches; and on the top of it are many little shops on both sides. It was built in 1567, and has hitherto withstood the force of the stream, which, in the time of the rains, frequently flows over the bridge; and in 1774 a brigade of the British army passed over it in boats. Jionpour is 48 m. N. W. of Benares. Long. 82. 55. E., lat. 25. 45. N.

Joachim, a village in Jefferson Co. Missouri.

Joachimthal, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Saatz, noted for its mines and a manufacture of lace. 15 m. N. by E. of Elabogen.

Juan de Porto Rico, St., the capital of the island of Porto Rico, with a good harbour, defended by several forts. It is a bishop's see; and is well built, and better inhabited than most of the Spanish towns. It was taken by sir Francis Drake, and afterwards by the earl of Cumberland; but, losing most of his men by sickness, he was obliged to abandon it. In 1615 the Dutch took and plundered this city, but could not retain it. It stands on a peninsula, on the N. coast of the island. Long. 66. 45. W., lat. 18. 29. N.

Juan de Ulua, St., a small island in the gulf of Mexico. See Vera Cruz.

Juan Fernandez, an island in the Pacific Ocean, 38 leagues eastward of the island of Masafuero, and 350 W. of the continent. It is supposed to have been inhabited by a Spaniard, whose name it retains; but it is more remarkable for having been the residence of Alexander Selkirk, a Scotchman, whose life and adventures furnished De Foe with the ground-work of that admirable novel, Robinson Crusoe. The island is about 40 m. in circumference, and at a distance appears like a naked rock; but there are intersecting valleys covered with wood, and a great number of goats on the side of every hill. In 1766 a settlement was made by the Spaniards on the N. and highest part of this island, at Cumberland Bay, which is defended by batteries. The town is situate in a fine valley, between two high hills, and every house has a garden, with arbors shaded with vines. Long. 78. 52. W., lat. 33. 40. S.

Jundispore, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Bahar, 20 m. from Patna.

Juggernaut, a place of Hindoo worship, on the coast of Orissa, district of Cuttack, with a pop. estimated at 30,000. It is one of the most celebrated places in India. All the land within 20 m. is considered holy; but the most sacred spot is enclosed with a stone wall 21 feet high, and forms nearly a square, being 656 feet long and 626 wide. Within this area are about 50 temples, dedicated to various idols; but the most conspicuous buildings consist of one lofty stone tower, 184 feet high and 28 1-2 feet square inside, and two adjoining stone buildings with pyramidal roofs. The tower is occupied by the idol Juggernaut, his brother Bulbudra, and his sister Subudra, and the other buildings are used for purposes connected with the worship. Adjoining is also a low building on pillars (with a fabulous animal in the centre, which is intended as an awning to shelter the entrance from the rays of the sun; and after this is another, where the food prepared by the pilgrims is daily brought previous to distribution. The temple of Juggernaut was erected by rajah Anung Bheem, in A. D. 1196; it was taken by the British, together with the town, in 1803. The roofs are ornamented in a singular style, with representations of monsters: the walls of the temples, which are not visible beyond the enclosure, are covered with statues of stone. Each side of the boundary wall has a large gateway in the centre; but the grand entrance is in the eastern face. The idol Juggernaut is made of wood, and is probably the coarsest image in the country, having a frightful black visage, with a distended mouth. The figure does not extend below the loins, and it has no hands, but two stumps in lieu of arms, on which the priests occasionally fasten hands of gold: a Christian is almost led to think that it was an attempt to see how low idolatry could debase the human mind. When two new moons occur in Assaur (part of June and July), which is said to happen about once in 17 years, a new idol is always made. After the wood is made into a proper form by common carpenters, it is entrusted to certain priests, who are protected from all intrusion. The process is a great mystery. One man is selected to take out of the old idol a small box, said to contain the spirit, which is conveyed inside the new; and the man who does this is always removed from the world before the end of the year. On certain festivals the images of Juggernaut, Bulbudra, and Subudra, are superbly dressed and placed in an immense moveable tower, which the pilgrims drag to a certain distance, and then return to the temple. During these processions many of the infatuated devotees fall under the wheels of the machine, and are crushed to death. There are two principal festivals (the Swinging and Car festivals) and eleven minor ones annually. The concourse of pilgrims to this shrine is immense; and the revenue derived from them by the British government is said to exceed £12,000 per annum. A road has been recently completed from Calcutta to Juggernaut, great part of the expense being paid by a rich Hindoo (rajah Sookmoy Roy) on condition that the road should be named after him. Juggernaut is seated a few m. N. E. of the Chilka Lake, 300 m. from Calcutta. Long. 85. 54. E., lat. 19. 49. N.

Julfar, a town of Arabia, in the province of Oman, situate on a bay of the gulf of Persia, 100 m. N. W. of Oman. Long. 56. 14. E., lat. 25. 55. N.

Juliens, a very fertile duchy of Westphalia, now forming part of the Prussian province of the Lower Rhine, adjacent to the territories of Aix-la-Chapelle, Liege, and Cologne. It contains 1,600 square m. and 200,000 inhabitants. Flax is cultivated, and made into fine linen, which is sent to Holland, and afterwards sold as the fabric of that country; there are also manufactures of cloth, ribands, brass, iron, and wire. This duchy was ceded, in 1648, to the palatine of Neuburg in whose family it continued down to the peace of Luneville, when it was given to France, but in 1815 it was transferred to Prussia.

Junion, St., a town of France, in the department of Upper Vienne, with manufactures of woollens, leather, hats, &c. It is seated on the river Vienne, 20 m. W. of Limoges.

Junkseilan, or Junkseylon, an island in the Indian Ocean, near the S. W. coast of Siam, about 60 m. long and from 10 to 20 broad. The soil is luxuriant, and it has a considerable trade in ivory and tin. The principal town, of the same name, is situate on the N. part of the island, and has a harbour capable of receiving vessels of a moderate size. Long. 98. 0. E., lat. 8. 10. N.

Jura, one of the western isles of Scotland, N. E. of the island of Islay, on the coast of Argyleshire. It is 26 m. long, and 7 broad, and is composed of huge naked rocks, piled one on another in the utmost disorder. The mountainous ridges occupy the centre of the island, extending along its whole length, and terminating in four mountains, called the Paps of Jura, which are of a conical form and of stupendous height. The west side of the island is uninhabited. The whole of the E. side forms a pleasing scene, and the coast is indented with bays and harbours. The only products are oats, barley, potatoes, and flax. A few wild roes are still seen here.

Jura, a department of France, including part of the late province of Franche Comte. It contains mines of iron of a superior quality, mines of copper and lead, and many quarries of black marble, jasper, and alabaster. It takes its name from Mount Jura. Lons le Saulnier is the capital.

Jura, Mount, a chain of mountains which begins in the canton of Zurich, in Switzerland, extends along the Rhine into the canton of Solcure and the principality of Neuchâtel, branches out toward the Pays de Vaud, separates that country from France, and continues beyond the frontiers of the Genevois as far as the Rhone. In the Pays de Vaud this chain forms many elevated alleys; particularly one on the top of that part called Mount Joux, which is watered by two picturesque lakes, the largest called Joux, and the other Brenet. These mountains have different names in different parts of their course in Switzerland.

Jussey, a town of France, in the department of Upper Saône, situate on the Amana, 17 m. N. W. of Vesoul.

Juthia. See Siam.

Jutland, a province of Denmark, bounded on all sides by the sea, except towards the S., where its boundary is the duchy of Sleswick. The name Jutland, was formerly applied to the whole peninsula forming the mainland of the Danish dominions, but it is now confined to the northern part of the peninsula, extending from 55. to 58. N. lat. It is about 180 m. in length, and from 70 to 90 in breadth; and is divided into four dioceses or districts, each of which has a bishop and governor. The prevailing religion is the Lutheran. The country is generally low, and, except the rocks on the E. coast, presents little picturesque scenery. In the E. are fine woods of oak, beech, fir, &c. The middle part consists of heaths and moors, with some arable land: it affords good pasture for oxen, sheep, and goats. The other parts are fertile, and yield large crops of grain (principally rye,) which together with horses and beavers, are annually exported to Sweden, Norway, and Holland. The air is cold, especially towards the North Sea, but the inhabitants are vigorous and robust. It is the only province of Denmark which contains useful minerals; and even here they are confined to iron, limestone, and marble.

Jyenagar, or Jypour, a fortified town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name, in the province of Agimere. It is a place of great wealth, being the staple for goods that are brought from the neighbouring provinces; and is reckoned one of the handsomest and most regular towns of Hindoostan. 120 m. W. by S. of Agra. Long. 75. 40. E., lat. 26. 56. N.

K

KADHEMA, a sea-port of Arabia, in the province of Bahrein. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in the pearl fishery. It is seated on a bay of the gulf of Persia, 170 m. N. by W of Lachsa. Long. 47. 36. E., lat. 28. 40. N.

Kalisch, a city of Poland, capital of the above palatinate, with manufactures of cloth, linen, and leather. It is surrounded by morasses and walls, has a collegiate and ten other churches, four religious houses, and a Catholic high school. 66 m. N. W. of Breslau.

Kalka Pira, a river of Chinese Tartary, which gives name to a tribe of Monguls, inhabiting the country N. of the Mongul Tartars, properly so called, which stretches as far as the kingdom of the Eluths, and is nearly 300 leagues in extent from E. to W.

Kallingburg, a sea-port of Denmark, in the isle of Zealand, seated on an inlet of the Great Belt, with the best harbour, next to Copenhagen, on the island. 55 m. W. by N. Copenhagen. Long. 11. 11. E., lat. 55. 47. N.

Kalmucs, a nation of Tartars, inhabiting that part of the Russian government of Caucasus which lies between the Volga and the Ural, toward the Caspian Sea. They all live in tents, and remove from place to place in quest of pasturage for their numerous cattle, consisting of horses, camels, cows, and sheep. They neither sow nor reap, nor make hay for their cattle, so that they live without bread, or any sort of vegetable; and, in winter, their cattle fare like the wild beasts. Their food is flesh (especially that of horses), fish, wild fowls, and venison; and they have great plenty of milk, butter, and cheese; but mare's milk is the most esteemed, and from it they make a strong spirit, to which they are partial. They are divided into a number of hordes or clans, each under its own particular khan, and all acknowledge the authority of one principal khan, who is called Orchicurtikhan, or the king of kings, and derives his pedigree from the great Tamerlane. All of them, however, have submitted to the government of Russia, or live under its protection. They are pagans, and believe in transmigration of souls. In person, manners, and customs, they resemble the ancient Sycthians, from whom they are descended. See Tartary.

Kalmunz, a town of Bavaria, seated at the conflux of the Nab with the Vils, 12 m. N. N. W. of Ratisbon.

Kamenitz, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Bechin, 27 m. E. by N. of Bechin.

Kaminieck, a strong town of Russian Poland, capital of Podolia, and a bishop's see, with a castle. When the Russians seized part of the Polish territories, in 1793, this fortress held out a long time but at last surrendered to their arms. The castle is seated on a craggy rock. 85 m. W. of Bracław.

Kamnitz, a town of Bohemia, with manufactures of stockings, glass, and linen; also several bleachfields. 21 m. N. N. E. of Leitmeritz.

Kamtschatka, a peninsula on the eastern coast of Asia, extending from 52. to 63. of N. lat. long. of its extremity to the S. being 156. 45. E. The isthmus joining it to the continent on the N. lies between the gulf of Olutorsh and Peshink; and its extremity to the S. is Cape Lopatka. Its greatest breadth is 336 computed m., being from the mouth of the river Tigril to that of the river Kamtschatka; and towards each extremity it gradually becomes narrower. It is bounded by the N. Pacific Ocean to the S. and E.; and by the sea of Okhotsk to the W. A chain of high mountains from N. to S. extends the whole length of the peninsula, and almost equally divides it; whence several rivers rise, and take their course into the Pacific Ocean, and the sea of Okhotsk. Stunted trees are thinly scattered over the whole face of the country, whose bottoms are mossy, with a mixture of low heath; the whole resembling Newfoundland in a most striking degree. The severity of the climate is in proportion to the sterility of the soil. Four months, commencing at midsummer, may be considered as forming their spring, summer, and autumn: the rest of the year is all dreary winter. They have great quantities of wholesome vegetables in a wild state such as chervil, garlic, onions, angelica, and wild celery, with some excellent turnips, and turnip radishes, upon a few spots of ground in the valleys; and this is the utmost extent of their garden cultivation. A variety of wild berries, which are gathered at proper seasons and preserved by mashing them into a thick jam, constitute a considerable part of the winter provisions, serving as a general sauce to their dried fish, the main article of food. The forests abound in wild animals, particularly the bear; and wild fowl are also plentiful. The people of Kamtschatka may be said to consist of three sorts, the Kamtschadales the Russians, and Cossacks, and a mixture produced by their intermarriages. The habitations of the natives consist of three different kinds, which they call jourts, balagans, and log-houses. They inhabit the first in the winter, and the second in the summer; in the third, introduced by the Russians, only the wealthy people reside. The external appearance of a jourt resembles a round, squat hillock; a hole serving for a chimney, window, and door, is left in the centre, and the inhabitants go in and out by the assistance of a long pole, having notches deep enough to afford a little security for the toe. The upper garment of the Kamtschadales resemble a waggoner's frock; if for summer wear it is made of nankeen; if intended for winter it is made of skin, having one side tanned, and the hair preserved on the other, which is worn innermost; a close jacket of nankeen, or other cotton stuff, is the next under this; and, beneath that, a shirt made of thin Persian silk, of any colour. They wear long breeches, and boots, made of skins, with the hair innermost. They have also a fur cap, with two flaps, that are usually tied up close to the head, but allowed to fall round the shoulders in rough weather. A species of dog, resembling the mountain or shepherd dog of Europe, is used for the purposes of labor and draught. None of the inhabitants keep fewer than five of these dogs, which in winter are fed upon offals or decayed fish: in summer, when their services are not required, they are left to range over the country and provide for themselves; but on the approach of winter they return home in the most punctual manner. They are harnessed to a sledge, two abreast, with one well trained in front as a leader, and are used both for travelling and for conveying all sorts of commodities from place to place. The Russians made themselves masters of the whole of this peninsula in 1706; but the government they have established is exceedingly mild, the inhabitants being permitted to choose their own magistrates. Skins and furs form the only articles of trade, in return for which they import brandy (the introduction of which has been attended with the most destructive effects), nankeens, and other Chinese stuffs, together with various commodities of Russian and European manufacture.

Kamtschatkoi, Niznei, a town of Siberia, capital of Kamtschatka, with a citadel, arsenal, and barracks. It is seated on the N. side of the river Kamtschatka, 20 m. from its mouth. Long. 161° 50' E., lat. 56° 30' N.

Kent, a county of England, 55 m. long and 28 broad ; bounded on the N. by the Thames and the German Ocean, E. by the same Ocean, S. E. and S. by the English Channel and Sussex, and W. by Surrey. It contains 935,600 acres ; is divided into 63 hundreds, and 414 parishes ; has two cities, Canterbury and Rochester, and 24 market towns ; and sends 18 members to parliament. In the soil and face of the country there is a great diversity. The banks of the Thames are low and marshy, but backed by a range of chalky eminences, sometimes rising to a moderate height. This kind of hard chalky soil, inclining to barrenness, extends to the N. E. extremity of the county, and thence round to Dover, exhibiting its nature in the lofty white cliffs which here bound the island, and produce that striking appearance at sea which gave it the name of Albion. The S. part of Kent, called the Weald, is a flat and woody tract of a clayey soil, and fertile. The midland and western districts are a mixture of hill and vale, arable and pasture, equal in pleasantness to any part of England. The minerals of this county, consists chiefly of chalk, flint, ragstone, and pyrites ; and the only mineral water of any note is that of Tunbridge Wells. The manufactures are few, and mostly of the coarser kinds, but every branch of agriculture is extensively prosecuted with ability and success. Besides the usual objects of agriculture, the county produces large quantities of hops, fruit of various kinds (especially cherries and apples, of which there are large orchards for the London markets), and madder for dyeing. The country inland from Dover, consisting chiefly of open downs, is excellent for the feeding of sheep ; and many bullocks are fattened to an extraordinary size in Romney Marsh. The principal rivers, besides the Thames are the Medway, Darent, Stour, Cray, and Rother.

Kendall, a village in Perry township, Stark Co. Ohio, with a woolen manufactory.

Kennebec, a river of the State of Maine, flowing into the Atlantic, formed by two branches, one of which rises in Moosehead Lake, and the other in the highlands on the north of the State. It is 300 m. in length and is navigable for ships 12 and for boats 60 m.

Kennebec, a county of Maine on the above river. Pop. 52,491. Augusta is the capital.

Kennebunk, p.t. York Co. Me., at the mouth of a river of the same name, 25 m. S. W. Portland. It has some trade in lumber. Pop. 2,233. Kennebunk Port has an additional pop. of 2,763.

Kent, a county of Rhode Island in the centre of the State. Pop. 12,784. East Greenwich is the capital. Also a central county of Delaware. Pop. 19,911. Dover is the capital. Also a county in the northern part of Maryland, on the eastern shore of the Chesapeake. Pop. 10,502. Chestertown is the capital. Also a county of Lower Canada lying on the St. Lawrence, opposite Montreal. Also a county of Upper Canada extending to the N. and W. without any defined limits.

Kent, p.t. Litchfield Co. Conn. on the Housatonic, 44 m. W. Hartford. Pop. 2,001. Also a p.t. Putnam Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,928.

Kent Island, in the northern part of Chesapeake Bay. It contains about 30,000 acres and is comprised within the county of Queen Anne.

Kentucky, one of the United States, bounded N. by Illinois, Indiana and Ohio ; E. by Virginia, S. by Tennessee, and W. by Missouri. It extends from 36 30. to 39. 10. N. lat. and from 81. 50. to 89. 26. W. long. Is 300 m. in length from E. to W. and 150 in mean breadth, and contains 42,000 sq. m. It is washed by the Ohio on the whole of its northern limit and traversed by the Licking, Kentucky and Green rivers. The Cumberland and Tennessee intersect the western extremity. The former rises in the eastern part of the state and passes into Tennessee after which it returns, and flows through Kentucky into the Ohio. The eastern boundary is formed by the Cumberland Mountains, and the eastern portion of the state is generally mountainous. The soil rests upon a bed of limestone from 3 to 10 feet below the surface. This substance is also mixed up in the soil and imparts to it a warm and exciting quality which with the help of moisture gives a remarkable freshness and vigour to the vegetation. The centre of the state contains a tract of 150 m. in length and 50 in breadth, which for beauty of landscape and richness of soil surpasses any region of the same extent in the western country. Along the Ohio between Salt and Green rivers is a large tract called the 'barrens' on account of its deficiency in wood, yet here the land is generally good, and covered with grass. In many parts of the state however, there are not wanting sterile and mountainous tracts unfit for cultivation. The general appearance of the county is remarkably picturesque, being diversified by hills and dales in the most charming manner. The woods have a delightful appearance and resemble groves promiscuously arranged by art for the effect of a pleasure ground. The trees are walnut, cherry, honey-locust, buckeye, pawpaw maple, cotton wood, mulberry, elm, ash, hawthorn, sycamore, &c. In the early part of spring the woods are covered with the purple flower of the red bud and the white blossoms of the dogwood. Grape vines of prodigious size climb the trees, and in early times the country was covered with a thick canebrake.

This state does not furnish many mineral productions, yet it is said to contain much iron and some lead and coal. Salt springs are common, but little salt is manufactured from them. There are some medicinal springs near Lexington, and Harrodsburg. The surface of the country in many parts exhibits remarkable cavities or depressions called sink-holes; these are something in the shape of inverted cones, and appear to be caused by perforations in the limestone rock beneath, which have occasioned the soil above to sink. The sound of running water has sometimes been heard at the bottom of these cones. But the most remarkable natural curiosity is the Mammoth Cave, near Green River, which has been traversed for 16 m. under the earth without reaching the end. The sides and roof are formed of a smooth limestone rock perfectly white. Some of its apartments are 8 acres in extent and 100 feet high. Others contain columns of brilliant spar and stalactites 60 or 70 feet in height. The earth in the cave is strongly impregnated with saltpetre, and here was found some years since an Indian mummy in perfect preservation.

The wheat raised in this state is of the finest kind. Maize is produced in great abundance. Hemp and tobacco, are, next to flour, the staple productions of the country. Some cotton is also cultivated. The manufactures are woolen and cotton cloth, cordage, bagging, maple sugar, saltpetre, paper, whiskey, leather, &c. The trade of the state is very flourishing. Agricultural and manufactured products are exported by steamboats and other river craft to New Orleans, and herds of cattle are driven across the mountains to the Atlantic States.

The legislature of Kentucky is styled the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The Senators are chosen for 4 years and the representatives for one. The Governor is chosen for 4 years; one fourth of the Senators are renewed annually. Elections are popular, and suffrage is universal. Frankfort is the seat of government, and Louisville is the largest town. The other large towns are Lexington and Maysville. There are colleges at Lexington, Danville, Augusta, Princeton, Bardstown, and Georgetown. The Baptists are the most numerous religious sect: they have 289 ministers; the Methodists 77; the Presbyterians 70; the Catholics 30 and the Episcopalians 5. The state is divided into 83 counties, and contains a population of 698,844, of whom above 165,350 are slaves.

This state was originally a part of Virginia, and was admitted into the Union as a state in 1792. The first settlement within its limits was made by the celebrated Daniel Boone in 1775.

He was a native of Maryland, and as early as 1769 made a visit to this country. In 1770 he was living alone in the woods, the only white man in Kentucky. The next year he with his brother explored the country as far as Cumberland river, and in 1773 Boone had collected a company of 45 persons who attempted to form a settlement but they were attacked by the Indians and lost their cattle. In 1775 he built a fort on the spot where Boonsborough now stands, and this was the first effectual settlement in the state. Boone was afterwards taken prisoner by the savages but escaped and arrived at Boonsborough after a journey of 160 m. through the woods which he performed in 4 days, eating but a single meal in that time. He was afterwards actively engaged in warfare with the Indians who continually annoyed the early settlers with hostilities. Being subsequently vexed with law suits respecting his title to the land in his possession, he retired to the banks of the Missouri; and led a solitary life among the forests. "We saw him" says Mr. Flint "on those banks with thin grey hair, a high forehead, a keen eye, a cheerful expression, a singularly bold conformation of countenance and breast, and a sharp and commanding voice, and with a creed for the future, embracing not many articles beyond his red rival hunters. He appeared to us the same Daniel Boone, if we may use the expression, jerked and dried to high preservation, that we had figured, as the wanderer in the woods, and the slayer of bears and Indians. He could no longer well decry the wild turkey on the trees, but his eye still kindled at the hunter's tale, and he remarked that the population on that part of the Missouri was becoming too dense, and the farms too near each other, for comfortable range, and that he never wished to reside in a place where he could not fall trees enough into his yard to keep up his winter fire. Dim as was his eye, with age, it would not have been difficult, we apprehend, to have obtained him as a volunteer on a hunting expedition over the Rocky Mountains. No man ever exemplified more strongly the ruling passion strong in death." He died in 1820 aged 86.

Kentucky River, rises among the mountains in the eastern part of Kentucky, and flows north westerly into the Ohio. It is a very rapid stream and for a great part of its course flows between high and perpendicular cliffs of limestone. It has a navigation of 150 m. and at its mouth is 450 feet in width.

Kilda, St. one of the Hebrides, 28 m. to the W. of North Uist. It is 3 m. long and 2 broad, fenced about with one continued perpendicular face of rock, of prodigious height, except at the landing place on the S. E., where there is a narrow and steep passage to a village on the top of a rock. The surface of the island is hilly; but it feeds many sheep, and produces plenty of barley and potatoes. Many of the inhabitants live chiefly by fishing, and catching wild fowl. In the latter employment, they are incredibly adventurous. Being let down by a rope from the summit of the precipitous rocks, they clamber along their fronts in search of the eggs and nests of various birds. St. Kilda is the most remote of the Hebrides, and is about 140 m. from the nearest point of the mainland of Scotland. Long. 8. 23. W., lat. 57. 43. N.

Kildare, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, about 37 m. long, and from 12 to 20 broad; bounded on the E. by Dublin and Wicklow, W. by King's county, and Queen's county, N. by East Meath, and S. by Carlow. The principal rivers are the Liffey, Barrow, and Boyne. It is a very fertile and arable country. It sends 2 members to the imperial parliament.

Kildare, a borough of Ireland, capital of the foregoing county, and a bishop's see. It is chiefly supported by frequent horse-races on what is called the Curragh, a fine turf plain, containing upwards of 5,000 acres, which feeds a great number of sheep. 27 m. S. W. of Dublin. Long. 6. 57. W., lat. 53. 9. N.

Kilfenora, a small town of Ireland, in the county of Clare, and a bishop's see united with Killaloe. 12 m. N. W. of Ennis.

Killarney, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, much frequented on account of the adjoining lake. 14 m. S. E. of Tralee.

Killarney, a beautiful lake of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, otherwise called Lough Lean, from its being surrounded by high mountains. It is divided into three parts, called the Lower, Middle, and Upper Lake. The northern, or lower lake, is 6 m. long and 3 broad. On the side of one of the mountains is O'Sullivan's Cascade which falls about 70 feet into the lake with a tremendous roar; and opposite this cascade is the island of Innisfallen. The promontory of Muc-russ divides the upper from the Lower lake, and, on passing round its extremity into the upper lake, there is a celebrated rock, called the Eagle's Nest, which produces wonderful echoes. The upper lake is 4 m. long and 2 broad, and from the mountains descend a number of beautiful cascades. The islands in this lake are numerous, and afford an amazing variety of picturesque views. The centre lake is small in comparison with the other two, and cannot boast of equal variety; but the shores are indented with bays, surrounded by dark groves of trees. The E. boundary is formed by the base of Mangerton, down the steep side of which descends a cascade, visible for 150 yards: this fall of water is supplied by a circular lake, near the summit of the mountain, called the Devil's Punch-bowl, which is considered one of the greatest curiosities of Killarney.

Kilcullen, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kildare, on the river Liffey, over which is a bridge. 9 m. E. S. E. of Kildare, and 25 S. W. of Dublin.

The Knisteneaux, denominated Cristineaux by the ancient Canadians, and Killistonus by some modern writers—Crees by the English, wander over, or inhabit all the country to the south of the lake of the Mountains, as far as the lakes of Canada, and from Hudson's Bay to lake Winnipeg. The Knisteneaux are of a moderate stature, are well proportioned, and possess a remarkable degree of activity. Black and piercing eyes animate their agreeable and open countenance. They paint their face of different colours. They wear a simple and convenient dress, cut and ornamented with taste; but sometimes they hunt, even during the severest cold, almost entirely naked. It appears that of all the savages of North America, the Knisteneaux have the handsomest women. Their figure is well proportioned, and the regularity of their features would obtain them admiration, even in Europe. Their complexion is not so dark as that of other savage women, because their habits are much more cleanly. These Indians are naturally mild, honest generous, and hospitable, when the pernicious use of spirituous liquors has not changed their natural disposition. They do not look upon chastity, however, as a virtue, nor do they imagine that conjugal fidelity is at all necessary to the happiness of the married state. Accordingly they offer their wives to strangers, and exchange them with each other, as Cato is said to have done. The fogs which cover their marshes, are believed to be the spirits of their deceased companions.

Kordofan, a country of central Africa, situated to the W. of the Bahr-el-Abiad, between the kingdom of Darfur and that of Sennaar. It is sometimes independent, and sometimes subject to the one or the other of these states. The inhabitants are said to be extremely licentious in their manners, and cherish a most inveterate enmity against those of Darfur. Ibeit is the capital.

Korfakan, a town of Arabia, in Oman, on a bay of the gulf of Ormus, 110 m. N. by W. of Rostak.

Korgan. See Jorjan.

Koriacs, a people of Siberia, who inhabit that part of the government of Okhotak which lies around the gulf of Penginskaia, and N. as far as the banks of the Anadir. They are divided into two sorts. Those called simply Koriacs have a fixed residence, and the resemblance between them and the Kamschadales is very striking. The others are wanderers, and are known by the appellation of Reindeer Koriacs; they roam in detached parties over these vast deserts, and are noted hunters and robbers. Their only property consists in their herds of reindeer, which they maintain by conducting them to those cantons that abound with moss; and, when these pastures are exhausted, they wander in search of others. The number of fixed Koriacs scarcely exceeds 900; and, though it is not easy to calculate that of the wandering Koriacs, it is imagined that they do not much exceed this amount. The features of the majority of the Koriacs are not Asiatic; and they might be considered as Europeans, but for their low stature, their ill shape, and the color of their skin. In general the women have sunken eyes, flat noses, and prominent cheeks, and in going about they carry their children in a kind of net or basket arched over, in which the infant is placed in a sitting posture, and sheltered from the weather. They acknowledge a Supreme Being, the creator of all things. He is supposed to inhabit the sun, whose burning orb they consider as the throne or palace of the Lord of Nature. They neither fear nor worship him: goodness, they say, is his essence; and it is impossible he should do any injury. The principle of evil they consider as a malignant spirit, who divides with the good Being the empire of nature. As the one is intent on the happiness of mankind, the other endeavours to render them unhappy. Diseases, tempests, famine, calamities of every kind, are his works, and the instruments of his vengeance. To pacify his wrath, they offer to him various animals, the first fruits of their hunting and fishing, and whatever they possess that is most valuable; but there is no temple set apart for his votaries, who conceive that they render him propitious by piously getting drunk in their jouts; for drunkenness is become with these people a religious practice, and the basis of all their solemnities.

Korinchi, a valley in the island of Sumatra, behind the range of mountains which forms the boundary of the countries of Anak, Sungei, and Indrapoor. It contains a fine lake, which abounds with fish, and its banks are covered with villages.

Kruszwica, a town of Russian Poland, in the palatinate of Brzesc, with a castle, noted for being the birthplace of Piasz, who from the station of a private citizen, was elected king of Poland in the year 842. It is seated on a lake called Goplo, which supplies the Netz with a great part of its water. 28 m. W. of Brzesc Litov.

Kteifa, a small walled town of Syria, on the borders of the desert, supposed to be the ancient Adarisi, 23 m. E. N. E. of Damascus.

Kuara, a province of Abyssinia, situated near the banks of the Bahr-el-Abiad. It is very mountainous and unwholesome, but abounds in gold, which is brought from the neighbouring countries. The governor is one of the great officers of state, and has absolute power in his own province.

Kubbees, a city of Persia, in Seistan, in the midst of a great sandy desert, on the road from Kerman to Herat. 160 m. S. E. of Yezd.

Kubesha, a strong town of Asia, in Daghistan, situate on a hill, between high mountains. Its inhabitants call themselves Franki (Franks, a name common in the E. to all Europeans), and form a republic. They are excellent artists, and make very good fire-arms, sabres and several articles in gold and silver, for exportation. They have, likewise, for their own defence, small copper cannons, of three pounds calibre, cast by themselves. They coin Turkish and Persian silver money, and even rubles, which readily pass current, because they are of the full weight and value. Kubesha is considered as a neutral town, where the neighbouring princes can deposit their treasure with safety. In 1725 it acknowledged the sovereignty of Russia, but without paying any tribute. Long. 47. 49. E., lat. 42. 30. N.

Kubin, a town of Hungary, in the Bannat, opposite Semendria, with 2,400 inhabitants, who carry on a brisk trade with Turkey.

Kulshcim, or Kulzheim, a town of Baden, in the principality of Leiningen, 40 m. E. S. E. of Heidelberg.

Kumania, Great and Little, two districts in the central part of Hungary, separated from each other by a considerable tract of country as well as by the river Theyses. Great Kumania comprises a superficial extent of 420 sq. m. with 13,000 inhabitants. Little Kumania is however the more extensive district, comprising an area of 1,000 sq. m., and a pop. of 41,000. The Calvinist is the prevailing religion in both districts.

Kundapure, a town of Hindoostan, in Canara, and the chief place in the northern part of the province. It is seated near the mouth of a river of the same name, which here expands into a lake, and forms a number of islands. It is the port for all goods coming from, or going to Nagara; but the bar will not admit vessels that draw more than 12 feet. It is 30 m. W. S. W. of Mangalore. Long. 74. 45. E., lat. 14. 24. N.

Kunersdorf, a village of Brandenburg, in the Middle Mark, 3 m. E. N. E. of Frankford on the Oder. Here, in 1759, was fought one of the most bloody battles on record between the Prussians and Russians, in which the king of Prussia, after a great slaughter of the enemy for upwards of six hours, was in the end obliged to quit the field with the loss of all his cannon and 20,000 men.

Kusaka, a district of Hindoostan, in the province of Orissa, situate on the sea-coast, near the Point Palmyras. Being much intersected by rivers, the rajah successfully maintained his independence against the Mahrattas, but surrendered to the British in 1805.

Karda, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Guzerat, near the N. W. frontier, about 3 m. S. of Theraud.

Kurdistan, a country lying partly in Armenia and partly in Persia, along the eastern bank of the river Tigris, and comprehending great part of ancient Assyria. Its limits are not precisely ascertained; but it may be viewed as bounded on the N. by Armenia, on the E. by Persia, on the S. by Arabian and Persian Irak, and on the W. by Diarbekir, or, as it is sometimes called, Algazira. It is divided into two parts, viz., Lower Kurdistan, or the western division, which is included in the pachalic of Bagdad, and corresponds nearly to the whole of the ancient Assyria Proper; and Ardelan, which extends from the small river Sharook to the Turkish district of Zohaub. The surface is diversified by mountains and valleys; and the soil is in some places fertile and well cultivated; but it abounds with deserts, and, except in the neighbourhood of the towns, is barren and desolate. Wheat and barley are the grains most commonly raised. The inhabitants are not subject either to the Turks or Persians. Some live in towns and villages, and others rove from place to place, having tents like the wild Arabs, and being robbers like them. The tribes are ruled by a number of their own princes or chiefs. They are proud of their descent; and demand a premium for their daughters on giving them in marriage. Their character and circumstances seem to have undergone little change since the most remote times. Xenophon is supposed to refer to them under the name of Carduchai, a people who opposed the retreat of the 10,000 Greeks. Their religion is partly Christianity and partly Mahomedism. Altunkupri is the capital. The chief towns are Kerkook, Solymania, Beltis, Erbile, Amadia, Sennah, &c.

Kurak, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, 34 m. W. of Sinob.

Kuriles, a long chain of islands at the eastern extremity of Asia, extending from the southern point of Kamtschatka to the isles of Jesso or Matsumai, an island of Japan. They lie between 42. and 51. of N. lat., and the whole length of the range is said to be nearly 900 m. Exclusive of the very small ones, they are 22 in number. They are annexed to the government of Irkutsk, and pay a tribute of furs and sea calves, which is collected every three years; the Russian authority however can only be considered as extending over 19, the three most southerly belonging rather to Japan. The northernmost, called Shoomaka, is three leagues from Cape Lopatka: the next, named Paramousic, is considerably larger than Shoomaka. Those two islands were first visited by the Russians, in 1713, and the rest have been gradually discovered since that period. Some of these islands are fertile, wooded and abound in fish and game; while others are destitute of water and uninhabitable, but are occasionally visited by the islanders for the sake of hunting foxes and otters. The natives are very hairy, wear long beard, and live entirely upon seals, fish, and the produce of the chase. They are hospitable and docile; but pusillanimous and unable to support misfortune with fortitude. Their houses and customs resemble those of the Kamtschatdales. They have some trade with the Chinese, Japanese, and Russians.

Kuron, a chain of mountains in Asiatic Turkey. See Tamus.

Kurak, a considerable town of European Russia, capital of a government of the same name. It has 16,000 inhabitants, a Protestant consistory, and 16 churches. The export trade is very considerable, amounting to about £150,000 sterling per annum. It is seated on the river Tuskara, 240 m. S. of Moscow. Long. 37. 8. E., lat. 51. 40. N.

Kusistan, or Chusistan, a province of Persia, bounded on the N. by Irac-Agemi, E. by Farsistan, S. by the gulf of Persia, and W. by Irac-Arabi. The N. part is mountainous, the S. flat and marshy. Tostar is the capital.

Labia, a town of European Turkey, in Servia, 70 m. S. W. of Nissa.

Labiau, a town of East Prussia, with a strong castle, seated at the mouth of the Deine, near the Curische Haff, 25 m. N. E. of Konigsberg.

Labrador, a country of North America, on the E. side of Hudson Bay. The general aspect of the country is most dreary: the surface is mountainous and rugged, and covered with large stones, and the soil is poor. Coarse plants, adapted to the nourishment of deer and goats and other wild animals, are its chief productions. The climate, in only lat. 47. N., is excessively cold during winter. The ice begins to disappear in May, and about the middle of July commences hot weather, which at times is such as to scorch the face of the hunters. Mock suns and halos are not unfrequent; and the night is enlivened by the aurora borealis, which spreads over the whole sky. No country is better furnished with large, safe, and convenient harbours, or supplied with better water. The numerous islands along the E. coast abound with eider ducks and other waterfowl, and also with hares, foxes, and deer. The animals are not numerous; the most common are reindeer, bears, wolves, tigers, foxes, beavers, otters, lynxes, martens, ermines, wild cats. The Labrador jumping mouse is common to this country and to all the interior as far as Slave lake. Eagles, hawks, owls, geese, bustards, ducks, partridges, and all kinds of wild fowl are numerous. The fishes are whales, moroses, seals, cod, and a white fish preferable to herrings; and in the rivers and fresh waters are pike, perch, carp, trout, &c. During the 3 months of summer there is a variety in the color of the several animals, but in winter everything, animate and inanimate, is white. The trees of Labrador are mere shrubs, with the exception of the black, white, and red spruce, silver fir, birch, and aspen. A few vegetables are produced, and various kinds of fruit. A beautiful spar, called Labrador stone, was discovered by the Moravian Missionaries, who have successfully exerted themselves in improving the condition of the natives. They have now 2 settlements on these inhospitable shores, the total pop. of which is about 600. The natives are called Esquimaux. They have no fixed abode, but rove from place to place, and sometimes come as far as Newfoundland. They are of a different race from the other native Americans; for the other tribes have no beards, but these have them so thick and large that it is difficult to discover any feature of their faces; they are likewise the only savages that eat their food in a raw state. They are of a middling stature, generally robust, lazy, and of a brown color. Their head is large, and their face round and flat; they have thick lips, a flat nose, long black hair, large shoulders, and uncommonly small feet. They are always well clothed; for there is nothing to be seen but part of their faces and their hands. They have a sort of shirt made of the guts of fish, with a coat of bear or bird skins, and a cap on their head. They have likewise breeches made of skins, with the hair inwards, and covered with furs without; also two pair of boots, one over another, of the same sort of skins. In summer, they have nothing to cover them in the night; and in the winter, they lodge in tents made of hides, or in caves. The dress of the women is nearly the same as that of the men. They are very superstitious, and have some sort of sacrifices. They acknowledge two invisible essences; the one has the origin of good; the other, to whom they pay the most homage, as the origin of every species of evil. Their chief employment is hunting and fishing. They are very covetous; and pay so little regard to private property as to take every advantage of bodily strength to rob their neighbours, not only of their goods but their wives. In other respects they are the mildest tribe, or nation, that is to be found on the borders of Hudson Bay. Murder, which is so common among all the tribes of southern Indians, is seldom heard of among them. A murderer is shunned and detested by all the tribe and is forsaken even by his relations and former friends. The women perform the most laborious offices; they pitch the tents, carry or haul burdens, make or mend clothes, and prepare the victuals. When any thing is prepared for eating, the wives and daughters are never served till all the males have taken what they think proper.

Laby, a considerable town of Western Africa, in the kingdom of Fouta Jalloo. It is upwards of 2 m. in circumference and contains 5,000 inhabitants, who are employed in the manufacture of narrow cloths, and various articles in iron, silver, wood, leather, &c., and carry on a good trade with Tambuctoo, which is four months' journey beyond.

Laccadives, a group of small islands in the Indian Sea, lying W. of the coast of Malabar, discovered by Vasco de Gama, in 1449. They are 39 in number: and are inhabited by a race of Mahomedans called Moplas, whose chief traffic is in the produce of the cocoa palm, such as oil, cables, and cordage; and in dried fish. These are sent to the continent of India, whence they get rice, &c., in return; and also to Muscat, in large boats, which bring back dates and coffee. Calpeny, one of the largest, is 170 m. W. of Cochinchina. Long. 73. 32. E., lat. 10. 0. N.

Lacedogna. See Cedogna.

Lacpedes Islands, a group of islands on the N. W. coast of New Holland: the largest is about 9 m. long. A long chain of rocky reefs and great sand-banks proceed from their termination. Many whales, sea serpents, and fishes of different kinds, are seen in the surrounding sea. Long. 117. 8. E., lat. 16. 43. S.

Lacfadery, mountains of Ireland, on the E. side of the country of Kerry, 12 m. E. of Tralee.

Lachen, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Schwitz, near which are some mineral springs, and petrifications: it is seated on the lake of Zurich.

Lachen, a large village of the Bavarian circle of the Rhine, district of Spire, 3 m. S. E. of Neustadt.

Lacsha, or Laesha, a division of Arabia, occupying nearly the whole of the southwestern coast of the Persian Gulf, and extending to a considerable distance inland. Great part of the interior consists of sandy plains; but the coast is fertile, and well peopled. The chief productions are dates, rice, and cotton. The asses and camels are esteemed to be of an excellent breed, and some thousands of the latter are annually exported to Syria. The extensive piracies committed by the inhabitants of this country were so intolerable that in 1809 the British fitted out an expedition for the purpose of chastising them. They sailed to Ras-el-Khima, the principal port on this coast, which they took by assault, burned 70 vessels, and made considerable plunder. Lacsha was formerly subject to Turkey, but the inhabitants have now shaken off the yoke, and their sheik is one of the most powerful princes of Arabia.

Lacsha, a city of Arabia, capital of the above province, and the residence of the sheik. It is well built, and seated on the Astan, which flows into a considerable bay of the gulf of Persia, opposite the isle of Bahrein. Long. 48. 40. E., lat. 26. 20. N.

Lanarkshire, a county of Scotland, bounded N. and N. W. by Renfrew, Dumbarton, and Stirling, N. E. by Linlithgow and Edinburgh, E. by Peebles, S. by Dumfries and S. W. by Ayrshire. It is 52 m. in its greatest length, and 33 in its greatest breadth, comprising a superficial extent of 870 sq. m., or 556,800 English acres. On the whole, it is mountainous and heathy, but pleasant and agreeably diversified, exhibiting landscapes intermingled with wood and water, hill and dale. It contains as much curious, romantic, and varied scenery, as any in Scotland; but the falls of the Clyde are particularly interesting to a stranger. The climate is rather moist, and the S. W. wind is the most prevalent. The county is divided into three districts, called the Upper Middle, and Lower wards, and contains 41 parishes. The river Clyde runs through the whole extent of the county, dividing it into two nearly equal parts. It abounds in lead, iron, and coal.

Lancashire, a maritime county of England, bounded S. by Cheshire, E. by Yorkshire, N. by Westmoreland, and W. by the Irish Sea. It is 74 m. from N. to S., and its greatest breadth is 44 m. It contains 1,155,840 acres; is divided into 6 hundreds, and 63 parishes; has 27 market towns, and sends 14 members to parliament. It is a county-palatine, under the title of the Dutchy of Lan east: the only duchy of England (that of Cornwall excepted) which is not merely titular. This county comprises a variety of soil and face of country; but upon the whole, is one of the least favoured by nature. The hundred of Furness, which is separated from the rest by Morecambe bay, is a wild and rugged region, stored with quantities of iron ore and slate, and covered with a growth of underwood, which is cut in succession, and made into charcoal. The E. part, between the Ribble and the Mersey, comprising the ancient forests of Wyresdale and Bowland, is mountainous and generally barren; but the S. part of the tract between these two rivers is flat. Much of this is a fertile country, though occasionally deformed by black turf bogs, here called mosses, some of which are of large extent, and impassable in wet seasons. In the N. E. part of this division are some lofty hills, the most noted of which is Pendle Hill. The remaining part is varied with hill, dale, and moor. Among its products, is a species of coal, called cannel, highly valuable as fuel, and capable of being manufactured into candlesticks, cups, snuff-boxes, &c. As a commercial and manufacturing county, it is superior to any other in the kingdom. Its principal manufactures are linen, silk, woolen, and cotton goods, shalloons, bays, serges, tapes, hardware, plate-glass, &c. Of the commerce of this county, it may suffice to observe that Liverpool is the second port in the kingdom. The principal rivers are the Mersey, Irwell, Ribble, Loyne, Levern, Wyre, Hoeder, Roche, Duddon, Winster, and Ken; and it has two considerable lakes, Winandermere and Coniston-mere. It has numerous canals, and had the honour of exhibiting the first regular one in the kingdom, which was begun by the duke of Bridgewater in 1758.

Lancaster, a borough and the capital of Lancashire. It is seated on the Loyne, or Lune, which forms a port for vessels of moderate burden. The parish church of St. Mary is a fine structure, on the side of a hill, on the summit of which is a noble castle, serving both as the shire-house and the county goal. Here are also two chapels belonging to the establishment, and several dissenting meeting-houses. On the top of the castle is a square tower, called John of Gaunt's Chair, whence there is an extensive prospect. Among the modern improvements are an extensive quay, with large warehouses, and a commodious and elegant bridge over the river, in place of the old one, now in ruins. The canal from Kendal, winds round the E. part of the town, and is conveyed over the river by an aqueduct of 5 arches, each of 70 feet span. Besides numerous other charities, there is a county lunatic asylum, a handsome stone erection on Lancaster Moor, opened in 1816. It has a chapel attached, and the hospital is capable of accommodating 300 patients. 5 m. from this place is Dunald-mill-hole, a cave at the foot of a mountain, into which a large brook runs and passes 2 m. under ground before it appears again: some of its vaults are so high that they resemble the roof of a church, and in other parts so low that they can be passed only by creeping on the hands and feet. Lancaster depends for its support principally on its trade and manufactures and the county business. The merchants trade chiefly to America, the West Indies, and the Baltic. It is noted for the making of mahogany cabinet ware, and has manufactures of sail cloth, cordage, linens, &c. The cotton manufacture is also gaining ground, and ship-building is carried on to a considerable extent. It is 53 m. N. W. of Manchester, and 240 N. N. W. of London.

Laon, a decayed town of France, capital of the department of Aisne, with a castle. The principal trade consists in corn and wine. It is celebrated for a battle fought under its walls, between the French and allies, in March, 1814. It is seated on a mountain, near the Ardon, 77 m. N. E. of Paris. Long. 3. 43. E., lat. 49. 34. N.

Laos, a kingdom of India beyond the Ganges, extending from 12 to 18. N. lat., and bounded by Laktho, Siam, Cambodia, Tonquin, and Cochinchina, to the last of which it is nominally subject. It is surrounded by mountains covered with forests; but the country is in general flat, and the soil fertile, being watered by numerous rivulets from the mountains and a number of canals from the Mecon, which flows from N. to S. through the whole region. It abounds in rice, fruit, honey, wax, and cotton; and the principal drugs are benzoin and lac. Gold and silver are found in certain places of the river; and it has mines of iron, lead, and tin. It is very thinly inhabited, the greater part of the population consisting of migrating tribes, who wage an almost constant internal warfare. The religion, language, and manners are much the same as in Siam. Lanjan is the capital.

Lapland, a northern region of Europe, now belonging to Russia and Sweden, bounded on the N. by the Arctic Ocean, E. by the White Sea, S. by Sweden, and W. by Norway and the Atlantic. It was formerly divided into three parts, Russian, Swedish, and Danish (or Norwegian) Lapland. The first, the most dreary region of the whole, consisted of three districts, Bellamoreskoi, Maremanskoi, and Terskoi; but these are now all included in the general appellation of the circle of Kola, which includes also the tract on the E. of the Torneo called Kemi-Lapmark, which was ceded by Sweden in 1809. Swedish Lapland, or Lapland Proper, is subdivided into six provinces, now comprised in the government of Umea. Norwegian Lapland, or Finmark, the most northerly of all, now belongs also to Sweden. The general aspect of Lapland is mountainous. The principal rivers are, the Tornes, which issues from a lake of the same name, and, after a course of 300 m., falls into the gulf of Bothnia; the Tana, and the Alten, both of which fall into the Frozen Ocean. The lakes are numerous, and many of them very extensive. The maritime districts are of uniform and rather mild temperature; but in the interior the winter is intensely cold: in the most northern parts the sun remains below the horizon from the 20th of November to the 10th of January; and the whole country is covered with snow and ice from the beginning of September to the middle of March. In summer the sun continues two months above the horizon; and in the valleys and plains the heat is excessive, favoring the production of numerous insects, particularly mosquitoes, which greatly infest the inhabitants. Barley is the common grain, but rye and oats are also cultivated in some places, and a few culinary vegetables are raised. The trees are fir, birch, larch, and small beech, which form vast though not thick forests. Metals and minerals are found in abundance: gold has been found at Suappavara; copper, iron, lead, zinc, and plumbago, are found in various places; and in the S. of Swedish Lapland several mines are wrought. Among the other internal productions of this country are limestone, marble, gypsum, rock-crystal, jasper, amethysts, and garnets.

The animals of this country are much the same as those of Norway; but the rein-deer may more properly be said to belong to Lapland. The singular usefulness of this animal in a great measure recompenses the Laplander for the privation of the other comforts of life. The rein-deer in summer live upon leaves and grass, and in winter upon moss, which they dig up from under the snow; yet upon such scanty fare they will perform a journey of inconceivable length. The animal is fixed to a kind of sledge, shaped like a small boat, in which the traveller, well secured from cold, is laced down; and taking the reins, which are fastened to the horns of the animal, in one hand, and a kind of bludgeon, to keep the carriage clear of ice and snow, in the other, he sets out, and continues his journey with incredible speed, the animals choosing the road and directing their course with very little trouble to the traveller. Their milk and cheese are nutritive and pleasant; their flesh is well tasted food, whether fresh or dried; their skin forms excellent clothing both for the bed and body; and their intestines and tendons supply their masters with thread and cordage.

The Laplanders are rather lower in stature than the more southern Europeans. The men are of a swarthy and dark complexion; their hair is black and short, their mouth wide, and their cheek hollow, with a longish pointed chin. The women are in general well made, complaisant, chaste, and extremely nervous. In their manner of life the Laplanders are divided into fishers and mountaineers. The former, in summer, fix their habitations in the neighbourhood of some lake, from which they draw their subsistence, and in winter live in the woods. The latter seek their support on the mountains, and possess herds of rein-deer more or less numerous. They are active and expert in the chase; and the introduction of fire-arms has almost abolished the use of the bow and arrow. Besides looking after the rein-deer, the fishery, and the chase, the men are employed in making canoes, sledges, harness, cups, bowls, &c.; and the women in making nets, drying the fish and meat, milking the deer, making cheese, and tanning hides. Like the Icelanders, they consider their country the finest in the universe. They live in tents composed of several poles or beams of wood, which meet at the top and support each other; the fire-place consists of a few stones, and is always in the middle of the hut, a hole being at the top for the smoke to pass. When travelling, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather, they throw a covering over the head, neck, and shoulders, leaving only a small opening, through which they see and breathe. In their dress they use no kind of linen. The men wear close breeches, reaching down to their shoes, which are made of untanned leather, pointed and turned up before. Their doublet is made to fit their shape; it is open at the breast, and over it they wear a close coat, with narrow sleeves, the skirts of which reach down to the knees and are fastened round them by a leathern girdle, ornamented with plates of tin and brass. To this girdle they tie their knives instruments for making fire, pipes, and other smoking apparatus. The dress of the women is the same as that of the men, with the exception of a few ornamental peculiarities. All the Swedish and Norwegian, as well as the greater number of the Russian Laplanders, bear the name of Christians; but their religion is full of superstition, and a compound of Christian and Pagan ceremonies. Their language has an affinity with the Finnish, but is greatly intermixed with others. They trade with the Swedes and Norwegians, whom they supply with the skins and furs of quadrupeds, such as ermines, sables, martens, squirrels, foxes of various colors, bears, lynxes, and wolves; and receive in return meal, cloth, spirituous liquors, tobacco, and various utensils.

Laprairie, a Seignory of Huntingdon Co. L. C. on the St. Lawrence opposite Montreal.

Lar, a town of Persia, capital of Laristan, with a castle on a rock, chiefly celebrated for the manufacture of muskets and cloth. It was once a magnificent city, but is now in ruins. Lead mines. This name is given to a tract of country on the Upper Mississippi which contains inexhaustible quantities of lead ore. The tract is more than 200 m. in extent. The chief mines are in the neighbourhood of Galena in the North Western part of Illinois. Here are the richest lead mines hitherto discovered on the globe. This portion of country lies principally north of Rock river and south of the Wisconsin. Dubuque s, and other rich mines, are west of the Mississippi. Native copper, in large quantities, exists in this region, especially at the mouth of Plum creek and on the Peكاتonokee. Plum creek is a small creek, of Illinois about 40 miles above Rock river, which runs into the Mississippi. Peكاتonokee is a branch of Rock river. For many years the Indians, and some of the French hunters and traders, had been accustomed to dig lead in these regions. They never penetrated much below the surface, but obtained considerable quantities of the ore, which they sold to the traders. In 1823, the late Col. James Johnson, of Great Crossings, Ky. obtained a lease of the United States Government, and made arrangements to prosecute the business of smelting, with considerable force, which he did the following season. This attracted the attention of enterprising men in Illinois, Missouri, and other States. Some went on in 1826, more followed in 1827, and in 1828 the country was almost literally filled with miners, smelters, merchants, speculators, &c. Such was the crowd of adventurers in 1829, in this hitherto almost unknown and desolate region, that the lead business was greatly overdone, and the market for a while nearly destroyed. Fortunes were made almost upon a turn of the spade, and lost with equal facility. The business is now reviving, and probably will be prosecuted in future more in proportion to the demand for lead. The following table shows the amount of lead made annually at these diggings, from 1821, to Sept. 30, 1830. Pounds of lead made from 1821, to Leeds, a flourishing town in West Yorkshire, Eng. It stands on the river Aire, over which is a stately stone bridge. It is the principal of the clothing towns in Yorkshire, and the mart for the colored and white broad cloths, of which vast quantities are sold in its two cloth halls, within the space of an hour, without the least confusion. Leeds has flourishing manufactures of carpets; also some mills for the cutting of tobacco, and several potteries. In the neighbourhood are numerous collieries, and great quantities of coal are sent to York and Hull. 3 m. N. N. W. of the town, on the river Aire, stands the remains of that venerable pile, Kirkstall Abbey, embowered in groves of oak. A canal passes hence to Liverpool, by which and the river this town has a communication with the Irish Sea and the German Ocean. 24 m. S. W. of York, and 189 N. W. of London. Long. 1. 34. Leetakoo, or Lattakoo, a town of Southern Africa. The old town of this name was until lately the most remote place known in the Botswana country. The inhabitants, when visited by Mr. Campbell and others in 1813, appeared to have made considerable progress in the arts and civilization. Soon after they removed to a more suitable situation, several miles distant, in a southern direction, and founded New Leetakoo. On his return, in 1820, he found this new town occupied by about 8,000 persons, collected from various tribes. The women perform most of the agricultural labor; while the men milk the cows, make the clothes, and go to war. New Leetakoo is 800 m. N. E. of Cape Town.

Leghorn, a strong city of Italy in the grand duchy of Tuscany, and a bishop's see. It has a good harbour, and is the greatest commercial depot of Italy. The Jews, who are numerous and rich, have a handsome synagogue and schools; the Greeks and Armenians have churches of their own; and no religion is disturbed. The inhabitants are computed at 66,000. The town is supplied with excellent water brought from the mountains of Cologne by means of a long and expensive aqueduct, constructed by government. The streets are wide and straight, and almost all the houses of the same height. There are so many canals, that some have given it the title of New Venice. At a little distance is a light-house, on a small island. The trade consists of foreign goods, as cotton, sugar, cocoa, spices, sulphur, and alum; and in home productions, as essences, oils, wine, straw hats, cloth, juniper berries, oranges, lambs' and goats' skins, and coral. In 1741 this city suffered greatly by an earthquake. The neighbouring marshes have been rendered fit for culture by means of canals, which have also been useful in dissipating the noxious effluvia: but the air is still far from healthy. 140 m. N. W. of Rome, and 46 W. of Florence. Long. 10. 17. E., lat. 43. 33. N.

Legnano, a town of Austrian Italy, in the Veronese, with a fortress regularly constructed. The town is populous, and carries on a considerable trade, particularly in grain, which is greatly facilitated by means of a canal from the Adige to the Po. It is seated on the Adige, 22 m. S. E. of Verona.

Leibnitz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Lower Styria, seated on the Sulm, 16 m. S. of Gnatz.

Lehigh, a river of Pennsylvania running into the Delaware from the N. W. In this neighbourhood are large coal mines, for an account of which see Pennsylvania.

Lehigh, a county of the E. District of Pennsylvania lying upon the river above mentioned. Pop. 22,266. Allentown is the capital.

Leighton, a village of Northampton Co. Pa. on the Lehigh, 36 m. N. W. Easton.

Leicester, a borough and the capital of Leices tershire, Eng. In the civil wars the walls were in a great measure demolished; the castle was also dismantled, the hall and kitchen being the only parts that are left entire. It has 6 churches, 18 meeting-houses for the different denominations of dissenters, several hospitals, a free school and three charity schools. In 1831 an act was passed for lighting the town with gas, which has since been carried into effect. The principal manufacture is that of stockings, of which several years ago the value amounted to £80,000 annually, and it has of late much increased. A canal passes hence by Loughborough to the river Trent. At a parliament held here, in the reign of Henry V., the first law was made for the burning of heretics. In the meadows near the town are the ruins of an abbey, in which Cardinal Wolsey died. It is seated on the Soar, 28 m. S. by E. of Derby, and 96 N. N. W. of London. Long. 1. 8. W., lat. 52. 53. N.

Leicestershire, a county of England, bounded on the N. by Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, E. by the counties of Lincoln and Rutland, S. by Northamptonshire, and W. by Warwickshire and Staffordshire. It is about 45 m. long and 30 broad, contains 51,456 statute acres, is divided into six hundreds and 196 parishes, has 12 market towns, and sends four members to parliament. The climate is temperate and the county is well watered. The chief rivers are the Avon, Soar, Swift, Wreke, Anker, and Welland; and it has three distinct lines of canal navigation. The soil, in general, affords great quantities of rich grazing land and is peculiarly fitted for the culture of beans. Toward the N. W., the Bardon-Hills rise to a great height; and in their neighbourhood is Sherwood Forest, a rough and open tract: further to the N. W. are valuable coal mines. The manufacture of stockings, the principal one in the county, is very considerable; but it may be considered rather an agricultural than a manufacturing county. It is famous for its breed of large black cart horses, numbers of which are continually sent to London, and for its fine neat cattle and sheep: the latter, owing to the great care paid to crossing the breed and other modes of improvement, have been brought to an astonishing degree of excellence. More than half the land is constantly in pasture, and most of the rest maintained in tillage is also rendered subservient to the rearing of cattle. The principal object of the graziers here is to fatten their cattle for the butcher, but the dairy is also in some places attended to; and great quantities of cheese are annually exported. The Stilton cheese is made in this county, near Melton Mowbray.

Leicester, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 46 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 1,789. Here is a manufactory of wool cards. Also a township of Livingston Co. N. Y. on the Genesee. Pop. 2,049. Also a township of Addison Co. Vt. on Otter Creek. 42 m. N. W. Windsor. Pop. 638.

Leipzig, Circle of, a province of the kingdom of Saxony, bounded E. by the circle of Meissen, S. by that of the Erzgebirge and the principality of Altenburg, and W. and N. by the Prussian part of Saxony. It comprises 14 bailiwicks, and is the seat of considerable manufactures.

Leipzig, a city of Saxony, in the circle of Meissen, with a famous university, and a strong citadel, called Pleyssenburg. It carries on a considerable trade; and has three great fairs every year, which last a fortnight each. The number of inhabitants exceeds 30,000; and the principal manufactures are silk, gold, and silver stuffs, linen and cotton printing, leather, and paper. There are six handsome colleges belonging to the university, besides the private colleges; and the exchange is a fine structure. Leipzig was taken by the Prussians in 1745 and 1756. The Austrians, in 1756, besieged it in vain; they took it two years after, but were soon obliged to give it up. Leipzig is celebrated for two of the greatest battles recorded in history having been fought in its vicinity, between the French and allied armies, on the 16th and 18th of October, 1813, which were followed by the capture of the town and the rear-guard of the French army, on the following morning, and also the king of Saxony and his family, who were made prisoners. It is seated in a plain, on the river Pleyssse, 64 m. W. N. W. of Dresden, 90 S. W. of Berlin, and 180 N. E. of Frankfurt on the Maine. Long. 12. 21. E., lat. 51. 19. N.

Leith, a sea-port of Scotland, on the frith of Forth, 2 m. N. N. E. of Edinburgh, of which it is the port. It is situate at the mouth of the river

Leith, which forms the harbour, and divides the town into N. and S. Leith, which communicate by two draw-bridges. The harbour is secured by a noble stone pier, and it is accommodated with wet and dry docks and other conveniences for ship-building, which is carried on to a considerable extent. Here are also manufactures of ropes, canvas, carpets, glass, shoes, leather, soap, and candles, and several iron forges. There are three churches, an episcopal chapel, three meeting-houses, a magnificent banking-house, an hospital for disabled seaman, rebuilt in 1817, and numerous charities. A little to the E. of the town are the baths, which are constructed upon a grand scale, and in a style of great elegance. The harbour is defended by a martello tower and to the W. of the citadel is a battery for the protection of the shipping. The commerce of Leith is very considerable; and the vessels employed in the London trade are, in general, of a large size; but the largest ships are those employed in the Greenland whale fishery. To foreign parts are exported lead, glass ware, linen, woolen stuffs, and a variety of other goods. Long. 2. 56. W., lat. 55. 54. N.

Lewarden, a strong town of the Netherlands, capital of Friesland. It has several canals in the streets, which, being continued to the sea, and to the most considerable towns in the province, are a great assistance to its trade. Many of the buildings, as well public as private, are magnificent. It is seated on the Ee, 28 m. W. of Groningen. Long. 5. 48. E., lat. 53. 13. N.

Leventz, a town of Hungary, on a river of the same name, 25 m. N. E. of Gran.

Lewes, a borough in Sussex, Eng. It had formerly 12 parish churches, now reduced to six, including those of the adjoining villages of Southover and Cliff. It is a very ancient place, and vestiges of its walls and castle, and of an extensive priory, still remain. Here are 7 meeting-houses for dissenters; also a handsome county-hall, a free grammar school, a good charity school, several charitable institutions, and a theatre. On a hill, about a mile from the town, is the race ground, which is accounted one of the best in England. Near this town was fought a battle in 1263, when Henry III. and his son (afterward Edward I.) were made prisoners by the earl of Leicester. Lewes is situate at the edge of the South Downs, 8 m. N. E. of Brighton, and 49 S. of London. Long. 0. 2. E., lat. 50. 55. N.

Lewis, one of the most considerable of the Western Islands of Scotland, parted by two arms of the sea into two divisions, the southern of which is called Harris, and the northern Lewis: the former is annexed to the county of Inverness, but Lewis belongs to Ross-shire. It is about 60 m. in length from N. to S., and from 10 to 15 in breadth. The country in general is wild, bleak, bare of wood, and little fitted for cultivation. Bear, oats, peas, rye, and potatoes, are the products of the soil. The hills are covered with heath, which affords shelter for various sorts of game. The lake and streams abound with salmon, large red trout, &c., and there are good fisheries on the W. coast, which is annually visited by millions of herrings. The inhabitants amount to 13,942, whose principal employment is the rearing of sheep and black cattle, and the fishery. There are several small villages, but Stornaway is the only town. The promontory at the N. extremity of the island is called the Butt of Lewis. Long. 6. 32. E., lat. 58. 33. N.

Lexington, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 11 m. N. W. Boston. Pop. 1,541. This town will be ever memorable in American history, as the spot where the first blood was shed in the revolutionary conflict. This took place on the 19th April 1775. A monument has been erected on the green at Lexington in commemoration of the event.

Lexington, a town of Kentucky, chief of Fayette county, and formerly the capital of the state. It has six edifices for public worship, a university, and a court-house. The trade is considerable, and the manufactures numerous and flourishing. Pop. 6,104. Near this town are to be seen curious sepulchres, full of human skeletons, which are fabricated in a method totally different from that now practised by the Indians. In the neighbourhood are the remains of two ancient fortifications, with ditches and bastions; one containing about six acres of land, and the other nearly three. Pieces of earthen vessels, a manufacture with which the Indians were never acquainted, have also been ploughed up near Lexington. These, with the fortifications and the sepulchres, have been urged as an argument that this country was formerly inhabited by a people farther advanced in the arts of life than the present Indians. Lexington stands in a fine tract of country, on the head waters of Elkhorn River, 24 m. E. S. E. of Frankfort, the present capital. Long. 84. 55. W. lat. 38. 15. N. Transylvania University at this place was founded in 1798. It has 6 instructors and 93 students. Its libraries have 3,850 volumes. It has 2 vacations in spring and autumn. Commencement is in September.

Lexington, a District of South Carolina. Pop. 9,076.

Leyden, a city of the Netherlands, in S. Holland, seated on the ancient bed of the Rhine, which here almost expires in a number of small channels. It is famous for the long siege it sustained in 1574, against the Spaniards, during which 6,000 of the inhabitants died of famine and pestilence. In honour of this siege a university was founded in 1575, celebrated for its colleges, botanical garden, anatomical theatre, astronomical observatory, cabinet of natural history, and valuable library: in 1807 it was almost destroyed by the blowing up of a vessel loaded with gunpowder. The principal church is a superb structure, and the old castle, town-house, custom-house and house for orphans, deserve notice. Here are excellent manufactures of soap and indigo; and the vicinity produces the best Dutch butter and cheese. It stands on 50 islands, and has 145 bridges, the greatest part built of freestone. The inhabitants are estimated at 50,000. Leyden is 4 m. E. of the German Ocean, and 20 S. W. of Amsterdam. Long. 4. 28. E., lat. 52. 8. N.

Leyta, one of the Philipines, about 40 leagues in length, and 95 in circumference. Its soil on the E. side, is very fertile: but the high mountains that intersect it from E. to W. occasion so great an alteration in the climate, that, when the inhabitants of one part of the island reap, the others sow, and they have two plentiful harvests in the year, to which the rivers descending from the mountains not a little contribute. The island contains 9,000 inhabitants, who pay tribute in rice, wax, &c. Long. 124. 40. E., lat. 10. 50. N.

Liam-po. See Ming-po.

Libanus, or Lebanon, a lofty mountain of Syria, extending from the vicinity of Tripoli to the borders of Palestine, about 30 or 40 m. from the sea. Its height is very considerable, the summit is covered with snow a great part of the year. Few specimens now remain of those magnificent cedars for which it was once so celebrated. Near Damascus there are immense caverns, one of which can contain 4,000 men. To the E. is a parallel chain called Antilibanus.

Libatta, a town of Guinea, in the country of Gabon, seated near the mouth of a river of the same name, 120 m. N. W. of Sette. Long. 8. 54. E., lat. 0. 58. S.

Libau, a town of Courland, on the Baltic, with a harbour for small ships. The chief articles of commerce are hemp and linseed. It is seated on a peninsula, 50 m. N. of Memel, and 80 W. of Mittau. Long. 21. 25. E., lat. 56. 30. N.

Liberia, a district on the coast of Africa, so named from its being colonized by liberated captives and free people of colour. Under the auspices of a colonization society, in America, the first settlers proceeded to Africa in 1822. Cape Mesurado, in lat. 6. 18. N., was purchased of the natives; the plan of a town, afterwards called Monrovia, was formed; and as fresh emigrants arrived they purchased additional tracts of country. The greater part of the early settlers from America were men of eminent piety, and their just, humane, and benevolent policy, has given them an uncommon influence over the native tribes. In 1827 this sable community had risen completely above the pressure of urgent necessities. Monrovia was rapidly improving in accommodations and increasing in magnitude, and several fresh towns were already springing up. The soil is extremely fertile: the natives of the country, without tools, without skill, and with little labour, raising more grain and vegetables than they can consume and often more than they can sell. Cattle, swine, fowls, ducks, goats, and sheep, thrive without feeding, and require no other care than to keep them from straying. Cotton, coffee, indigo, and sugar-cane, are all the spontaneous growth of the forests, and may be cultivated at pleasure, to any extent, by such as are disposed. The same may be said of rice, Indian corn, Guinea corn, millet, and too many species of fruits and vegetables to be enumerated. Add to all this that winter is here unknown, the hills and plains are covered with perpetual verdure, and nature is constantly pouring her treasures, all the year round, into the laps of the industrious. The trade and commerce extend to the coast, to the interior parts of the continent, and to foreign vessels, and is already valuable and fast increasing. The chief exports are rice, palm oil, ivory, tortoise shell, dyewoods, gold, hides, wax, and a small amount of coffee. The imports consist of the products and manufactures of the four quarters of the world. The harbour is seldom clear of European and American shipping; and the bustle and thronging of the streets show something already of the activity of the smaller seaports of the United States. Mechanics of nearly every trade are carrying on their various occupations, and not a child or youth in the colony but is provided with an appropriate school. The most recent accounts from Liberia are exceedingly encouraging as to the health, commerce, and prosperity of the colony. Fresh emigrants are constantly arriving, who are immediately supplied with employment, or if sick, removed to a spacious infirmary. The piety of the first settlers has continued to spread, and the standard of morals consequently remains high. The Sabbath is carefully regarded, and Sunday schools have been established for the benefit of the native children. The cheerful abodes of civilization and happiness—the flourishing settlements—the sound of Christian instruction, and scenes of Christian worship, which are heard and seen in this land of brooding pagan darkness—a thousand contented freemen, united in founding a new Christian empire, happy themselves, and the instrument of happiness to others—while they refresh the hearts cannot fail to encourage the brightest anticipations of Christian Philanthropists.

Liege, a large, ancient, and strong city of the Netherlands, capital of the above province. Here the river Meuse is divided into three branches, which after passing through the city, under several bridges, unite again. Liege is 4 m. in circumference, and has 16 gates: it has also 10 large suburbs, in which and the city there were formerly a great number of churches and religious houses, part of which are suppressed. The magnificent cathedral contains many relics; and the other public structures are the castle, the council-house, the hotel de ville, and the arsenal. There are manufactures of arms, clock-work, nails, cloth, leather, glass, &c., and a brisk trade. In 1792 the French took the city; they were driven thence in 1793, but entered it again in 1794; and it was afterwards annexed to France. In 1814, however, Liege, with its district, was delivered up to the allied forces. It is 60 m. W. S. W. of Cologne. Long. 5. 35. E., lat. 50. 38. N.

Lima, a province of Peru; bounded N. by Truxillo, E. by the Andes, S. by Arequipa, and W. by the Pacific Ocean.

Lima, the capital of Peru, and an archbishop's see with a university. This city was founded in 1534, by Pizarro, who gave it the name of Ciudad de los Reyes, or City of the Kings. This Spanish name it retains in all legal deeds, but is better known to foreigners by that of Lima. It is 4 m. long and 2 broad, and surrounded by brick walls, with ramparts and bastions. The streets are handsome and straight: the houses are generally only of one story high, in consequence of the earthquakes. They have flat roofs, and trees round them to keep off the sun. The river forms canals in the streets, which run to most of the houses, and serve to water the gardens, &c. The churches and convents are extremely rich; and many images of the saints are of gold, adorned with jewels. Here are the courts of the viceroy and the archbishop, the royal mint, and the court of the municipal body. All the provinces remit their product and manufactures to Lima, and are supplied hence with the necessary commodities. The inhabitants, estimated at 50,000, are rich, fond of dress and splendid retinues, and extremely superstitious. Lima is 90 m. from the Cordilleras, and 850 S. by E. of Quito. Callao is its port. Limekilns, a town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the coast of the Forth. It is famous for great lime-works, has a good tide harbour for small vessels, and is 4 m. S. W. of Dumfermline.

Limerick, a county of Ireland, in the province of Munster, bounded on the N. by the river Shannon, which separates it from the county of Clare, W. by Kerry, S. by Cork, and E. by Tipperary. It is 50 English m. long. from E. to W., and 32 broad from N. to S., and contains an area of 970 square m. with 218,432 inhabitants, exclusive of the city of Limerick. It is divided into 10 baronies, and 125 parishes, and sends two members to parliament. The principal rivers are the Deel, Maig, Comogue, Feale, Gal, and Blackwater, besides the noble river Shannon, which may rather be said to flow by the county. The surface of the county is tolerably level, but sheltered on the S. E. by a range of mountains called the Galtees; and the fertility of the soil is proverbial. To the N. of the Galtees lies the tract of land denominated for its fertility the Golden Vein, and on the banks of the Shannon lie the carlaghs, or swamps, on which a quantity of manure is annually deposited by the overflowing of the river.

Limerick, a city of Ireland capital of the above county, and generally considered the metropolis of the province of Munster. It was formerly well fortified, and reckoned the second city in the kingdom, but has long since yielded that rank to Cork. Limerick is a county of itself, and a bishop's see, and is divided into the Irish and English town, the latter being built on an island of the Shannon called King's Island. The inhabitants are estimated at upwards of 40,000, and it has a market on Wednesday and Saturday. The linen, woolen, and paper manufactures are carried on to a great extent; and the export of provisions is considerable. Besides the cathedral and other churches, it has a modern episcopal palace, many hospitals, and other handsome public structures. King William was obliged to raise the siege of this city in 1690; but in 1691, the garrison surrendered on a very honorable capitulation. It is 40 m. S. S. E. of Galway, and 94 W. S. W. of Dublin.

Limmat, a river of Switzerland, formed by the junction of the Mat and the Linth, the former issuing from the N. W. extremity of the lake Wallenstadt, and the latter flowing from the S. The Limmat flows N. W., passes through the lake of Zurich, and unites with the Aar below Baden Limne, or Limpne, a village in Kent. Eng. near it are the remains of a fortress called Stutfall Castle. It was formerly a port, but is now 2 m. from the sea. The Roman road from Canterbury, called Stanes Street, ended here. 3 m. S. W. of Hithe, and 64 S. E. of London.

Limoges, an ancient town of France, department of Upper Vienne. It is a trading place, and the inhabitants are estimated at 20,000. It is seated on the Vienne, 110 m. E. of Bordeaux. Long. 1. 20. E., lat. 45. 50. N.

Limosin, or Limousin, a late province of France, divided into the Upper and Lower Limosin, the former of which is cold and hilly, but the latter is temperate and fertile. It contains mines of lead, copper, tin, and iron, and now forms the departments of Upper Vienne and Correze.

Limoux, a town of France, department of Aude, with manufactures of woolen, leather, and soap. It is seated on the Aude, 50 m. S. E. of Toulouse.

Lincoln, a city and the capital of Lincolnshire, Eng. It is situate on the river Witham, is divided into Upper and Lower Town, and has two suburbs. Formerly it contained 52 churches, now reduced to 15. It is a bishop's see, and the diocese, though much-reduced, is still the largest in England. The cathedral stands on the brow of the hill, and is admired for its rich and light architecture. The great bell of the cathedral, called Tom of Lincoln, required 15 able men to ring it, but has been forbidden to be used, in consequence of the decay of the tower in which it hangs. Here are several meeting-houses for different denominations of dissenters, a catholic chapel, a national school erected in 1814, and several other schools and charitable institutions. Of the castle, built by William I., few vestiges remain, but the ruins of religious houses are so numerous that the very barns, stables, &c., are built with arched doors and windows. Newport Gate, on the N. side of the city still remains, and is one of the noblest remnants of Roman architecture left in Britain. Lincoln is a county of itself, governed by a mayor. The chief trade is in coal, brought by the Trent and Fossdike; and oats and wool, which are sent by the Witham. Here is a small manufacture of camlets. It is 32 m. N. E. of Nottingham, and 131 N. by W. of London. Long. 0. 25. W., lat. 53. N.

Lincoln, a county of Maine, on the Kennebec, and washed by the ocean. Pop. 57,181. Wiscasset is the capital; a county of N. Carolina on the Catawba. Pop. 22,625. Lincolnshire, a large maritime county of England, bounded on the N. by the Humber, which divides it from Yorkshire. It contains 2,888 sq. m., is divided into 30 hundredes, and 630 parishes; has one city, and 31 market towns; and sends 12 members to parliament. The coast is flat, and at low water may be seen the submarine relics of a forest, which is a great natural curiosity. The principal rivers are the Humber, Trent, Witham, Welland, and Ancholm. This country is divided into three districts, called Holland, Kesteven, and Lindsey. The air is various. The soil, in many places, is very rich, the inland part producing corn in great plenty, and the fens colesseed, and very rich pastures; whence their breed of cattle is larger than that of any other county of England, except Somersetshire: their horses are also excellent, and very large; their sheep are not only of the largest breed, but are clothed with a long thick wool, peculiarly fitted for the worsted and coarse woollen manufactures, and many of the unimproved fens are devoted to the rearing of geese, the quills and feathers of which are sent in immense quantities to the London and other markets. In the N. W. part, the rivers Trent, Dune, and Idle, form an island, called Axholm, which is a rich tract, and produces much flax. To the N. E. is a large tract of heathy land, called the Wolds, in which great flocks of sheep are bred. The southern portion is for the most part enclosed and well inhabited. Lincolnshire has no considerable manufactures, and its trade is almost confined to the exchange of its produce for manufactured and grocery goods, and other consumable commodities.

Lincolnton, towns in Lincoln Co. N. C. and Lincoln Co. Geo.

Lindau, a town of Bavaria, with a castle and wall, deemed to be Roman works. The French took possession of this city in 1796; and it became subject to Bavaria in 1805. It is a trading place, seated on an island of the lake of Constance, joined to the mainland by a long bridge, 25 m. E. S. E. of Constance, and 75 S. W. of Augsburg. Long. 9. 41. E., lat. 47. 32. N.

Lin-keang, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Kiang-si. It is thinly inhabited; but it is of some note, on account of one of its villages being the general mart for all the drugs sold in the empire. It is seated on the Yu-ho, 410 m. N. by E. of Canton. Long. 115. 0. E., lat. 27. 58. N.

Lindköping, a government of Sweden, corresponding nearly to the old province of East Gothland. It lies along the Baltic, and contains 3,280 sq. m. with 160,000 inhabitants.

Lindköping, a town of Sweden, capital of the foregoing government, and a bishop's see. It is defended by a castle, and stands on the river Stöeng, near the lake Roxen, 112 m. S. W. of Stockholm.

Linlithgow, a borough of Scotland, capital of Linlithgowshire, seated on a rising ground, overlooking a lake at its E. end. It has manufactures of leather, and in the neighbourhood are an extensive printfield, bleachfield, and two distilleries. Here the kings of Scotland had one of their noblest palaces, now in ruins; but the room is still shown in which queen Mary was born. Linlithgow is 17 m. W. of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 33. W., lat. 56. 0. N.

Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, a county of Scotland, 20 m. long and 12 broad; bounded on the N. by the frith of Forth, S. E. by Edinburghshire, S. W. by Lanarkshire, and N. W. by Stirlingshire. It is divided into 13 parishes, and contains about 20,000 inhabitants. The surface is finely diversified with hill and dale: it is fertile in corn and pasture, and produces coal, iron, limestone, and lead. The chief rivers are the Avon, and Amond.

Linnake, Loch, an arm of the sea, on the W. coast of Scotland, which separates the counties of Argyle and Inverness. It extends in a N. E. direction from the sound of Mull to Fort William, where it takes a northerly direction, and acquires the name of Loch Eil. Another branch, in a southeasterly direction, is called Loch Leven. This lake is bounded on each side by lofty mountains. The island of Lismore lies at its entrance, and in it are interspersed several smaller ones.

Linnich, a town of the Prussian states, in the duchy of Juliers; seated on the river Roer, 5 m. N. N. W. of Juliers.

Lin-tchin, a city of China, of the second rank, in the province of Chan-tong, seated on the great canal. Here is an octagonal tower, divided into eight stories, the walls of which are covered on the outside with porcelain. 137 m. S. of Peking.

Linton, a town in Cambridgeshire, Eng. seated on the river Granton, 10 m. S. E. of Cambridge and 40 N. by E. of London.

Lintz, the capital of Upper Austria, and a bishop's see, has two castles, and considerable woollen manufactures. The French became masters of it in 1741 and again in 1800. It is seated on the right bank of the Danube, over which is a wooden bridge, 96 m. W. of Vienna. Long. 14. 16. E., lat. 48. 21. N.

Lintz, a town and citadel of the Prussian states, in the late electorate of Cologne, seated on the Rhine, 23 m. S. S. E. of Cologne.

Lions Gulf of, in the Mediterranean, lying along the French coast between Spain and Italy. It was named thus from the furious storms to which it is subject, yet is commonly incorrectly written Lyons, as if called after the city of that name which is nearly 200 m. inland.

Lipari Islands, a cluster of islands in the Mediterranean, lying to the N. of Sicily, to which they politically belong. They are all of volcanic origin, were feigned to be the residence of Æolus and Vulcan, and formerly called Æolian Islands. They are 12 in number; and nearly as follows, in the order of their size: Lipari, Stromboli, Volcano, Salini, Felicuda, Alicuda, Panaria, Vulcanello, Vacheluse, Lisca, Dattolo, and Tila Navi. They produce great quantities of alum, sulphur, nitre, cinnabar, and most kinds of fruits, particularly raisins, currants, and figs. Some of their wines are much esteemed, particularly the Malvasia.

Lipari, the largest and most fertile of the Lipari islands, about 15 m. in circumference. It has not suffered from subterraneous fires for ages past though it every where bears the marks of its former volcanic state. It abounds with the currant grape; cotton also grows here; and great quantities of pumice are exported. It has a town of the same name, which is a bishop's see, and stands on the S. E. side of the island, 26 m. N. N. E. of Patti, in Sicily. Long. 15. 30. E., lat. 38. 35. N. Lipno, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Plocko, 33 m. N. N. W. of Plocko.

Lis, a river which rises in France, in the department of Pas de Calais, flows by Aire, St. Venant, and Armentieres, into Flanders, where it passes by Menin, Courtray, and Deynse, and joins the Scheldt at Ghent.

Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, and the see of a patriarch and an archbishop, with a university. It is seated on the N. side of the Tagus, 10 m. from its mouth, and built in the form of an amphitheatre, on seven hills, not broad, but six m. in length. The city is walled round, and it has so increased by degrees, particularly towards the W., that the old walls now divide the two dioceses; the E. part under the archbishop, and the W. under the patriarch. The harbour, which is capable of containing 1,000 ships in the greatest safety, is defended by two forts; and before the entrance to the city is the fort of Belem. Near this is a grand aqueduct, between two hills, which conveys water to a great reservoir at one of the extremities of Lisbon. In the middle of the city, on one of the hills, is a citadel, which commands the whole place. The cathedral, on another eminence, is ancient and gloomy; but the riches of the Portuguese have rendered it magnificent. The royal palace, which fronts the river, is large and magnificent, and contains a library, collected at vast expense by John V. Lisbon was almost destroyed by an earthquake in 1755, but has been handsomely rebuilt. It contains many beautiful edifices, 40 parish churches, 99 chapels, 75 convents of both sexes, and about 200,000 inhabitants. There are public walks, two theatres, and a circus for the bull-fights. The manufactures are in a backward state, but the trade is very considerable, and many foreign merchants, both catholic and protestant, reside here; this city being the grand magazine of all goods brought from Brazil, and the colonies belonging to Portugal. In December 1807 it was entered by the French, who retained possession till August 1808, when they evacuated it after the battle of Vimeira, in which they were defeated by the British. The inhabitants of Lisbon are described as superstitious, vindictive, and meanly acquiescing under power. In the early part of the revolution they made a noble stand for freedom, but have since submitted without resistance to the usurper Don Miguel. See Portugal. 178 m. W. by N. of Seville, and 255 S. by W. of Madrid. Long. 9. 5. W., lat. 38. 42. N.

Lisle, a strong city of France, in the department of Nord, and one of the most commercial towns in France. The inhabitants are estimated at 60,000. Its citadel is supposed to be the strongest in Europe, next to that of Turin. The streets and squares are adorned with noble buildings, particularly the Great Square and the Little Square; and among the public structures are the exchange, a magazine of vast extent, and a general hospital. The manufactures are numerous, comprising camlets, serges, cotton, linen, silk, velvet, lace, &c. Lisle was taken by the allies in 1708; but was restored by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, in consideration of the demolition of the fortifications of Dunkirk. In 1782 it sustained a severe bombardment from the Austrians. It is seated in a rich and marshy soil, on the Deule, 18 m. E. of Tournay, and 145 N. N. E. of Paris. Long. 3. 4. E., lat. 50. 38. N.

Liverpool, a city in Lancashire, Eng. with markets on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Saturday. Up to the close of the seventeenth century it was a very inconsiderable place, having only one church, which was a chapel of ease to Walton, a village 3 m. off. In 1669 an act was passed to make it a distinct parish, and erect a new church. Since this period it has been gradually advancing in importance; and, with respect to population and commerce, it is become the second port in the kingdom. It extends 3 m. along the E. bank of the river Mersey, and about a mile in average breadth; contains 23 churches and chapels for the establishment, a much greater number of meeting-houses for dissenters, five Roman catholic chapels, and a Jews synagogue. Among the public buildings, which comprise numerous specimens of architectural taste, the most important are the town-hall, exchange buildings, lyceum, Wellington rooms, corn exchange, infirmary, St. John's market, blue coat school, dispensary, asylum for the blind, theatre, atheneum, music hall, news room, custom-house, and a borough gaol on the Howardian plan. The streets are generally spacious, some of them elegant, and the greater part lighted with gas. At the head of the institutions for literary and scientific pursuits is the Royal Liverpool Institution, opened in 1817 at an expense of £30,000. To enumerate the asylums for the wretched and unfortunate, of every description and denomination, would be altogether incompatible with our limits. The increase and prosperity of Liverpool have been greatly promoted by the enterprise and skill of its inhabitants, by its local advantages, commanding the trade of Ireland and America, and by the wisdom of the corporation in abolishing all exclusive laws, and encouraging every species of industry and commercial talent. The principal manufactures, besides those connected with the shipping, which employ an immense number of persons, are fine porcelain, watches, glass, iron, salt, copperas, &c. The watch movement and tool business is almost confined to this part of the country; and the breweries, soap-works, brass and iron founderies, sugar-houses, &c., are on an extensive scale. Few towns possess accommodations for shipping at all comparable to Liverpool: it has, at present, six docks, the Dry Dock, Balhouse Dock, King's Dock, Queen's Dock, George's Dock, Prince's Dock, North Dock, and Brunswick Dock, which with their basins occupy nearly 100 acres of land. The estuary of the Mersey may be properly termed an arm of the sea, opening to this port a ready access to the Western Sea, and ships of any burden may come up fully laden to the town; while the system of canal navigation opens a communication inland with all parts of the kingdom. This port is now estimated to engross a fourth part of the foreign trade of Britain, a sixth of its general trade, and to furnish one-twelfth of the shipping: its customs amount to nearly £4,000,000, and its exports exceed even those of the metropolis. The town is governed by a mayor, and sends two members to parliament. 48 m. S. of Lancaster, and 206 N. W. of London. Long. 3. W., lat. 53. 22. N.

Liverpool, a town of Nova Scotia, in Queen's county, with a harbour at the mouth of a river of its name, 58 m. N. W. of Halifax. Long. 64. 15 W., lat. 44. 10. N.

Livonia, a province of Russia, which, with that of Esthonia, has been reciprocally claimed and possessed by Russia, Sweden, and Poland, and, for more than two centuries, was a perpetual scene of the most bloody wars. It was finally wrested from the Swedes by Peter the Great, was confirmed to the Russians by the peace of Nystadt in 1721, and now forms the government of Riga, or Livonia. It is 250 m. long and 150 broad; bounded on the N. by the government of Esthonia, and S. by Courland. The land is fertile, but is only partially cultivated: the products are rye, barley, flax, and linseed. In the forests are wolves, bears, elks, reindeer, stags, and hares. The domestic animals are numerous; but the sheep bear very bad wool. The peasantry are in a state of great degradation.

Loando, capital of the Portuguese settlement in Angola. It has a good harbour formed by the island of Loando, lying a little off the coast. The town is large and handsome, considering the country, containing 3,000 houses, built of stone, and covered with tiles, beside a vast number of huts made of straw and earth. 260 m. S. S. W. of St. Salvador. Long. 13. 15. E., lat. 8. 50. S.

Loande, an island in the Atlantic near the coast of Angola, about 20 m. long and only one broad, and divided from the continent by a narrow channel. Goats and sheep are numerous. It produces no grain, but yields the best water in all the neighbourhood.

Loango, a kingdom of Western Africa, to the N. of the river Zaire or Congo. It includes Loango proper, and the districts of Mayomba and Malembo, which are subject to the king of Loango: and is said to extend more than 400 m. along the coast, from the Zaire to Cape St. Catherine. The climate is said to be very fine, and never subject to hurricanes, nor even to violent winds. Rain rarely occurs, but the dews are sufficient for vegetation. The land is fertile, yielding with very little of agricultural skill or labour, three crops of millet in a year. The potato and yam are abundant; and there are a great number of trees whence palm-wine is drawn. The women cultivate the ground, sow, and get in the harvest. The inhabitants are well-made, mild, and tractable.

Loango, the capital of the above kingdom, with a harbour, at the mouth of the Quilla. The streets are wide, and lined with palm-trees, bananas, and bacava. The houses are oblong, and have only a ground floor; separated from each other, and fenced round with a hedge of palm-twigs, canes, or bulrushes. In the centre of the city is a large square, fronting the royal palace, which forms another square, a mile and a half in compass, surrounded by a palisado of stately palm-trees. The principal trade consists in elephants' teeth, palm-cloth, copper, tin, lead, iron, and slaves. It is 230 m. W. N. W. of St. Salvador. Long. 12.30. E., lat. 4. 40. S.

London, the metropolis of Great Britain, one of the largest and most opulent cities in the world mentioned by Tacitus as a considerable commercial place in the reign of the Roman emperor Nero. In its most extensive view, as the metropolis, it may be said to consist of five great portions, viz.: the west end of the town, the city, the east end of the town, Westminster, and the borough. The west end of the town is popularly regarded as extending from Charing Cross to Hyde Park, and from St. James's Park to Paddington. This is the best and most fashionable portion of the metropolis, and is chiefly occupied by the town residences of the nobility and gentry, and fashionable shops. The city includes the central part, and is the great emporium of commerce. The east end of the town is also devoted to commerce, ship-building, manufactures, &c. The southern bank of the Thames, from Deptford to Lambeth, bears a great resemblance to the east end of the town, being occupied by persons engaged in commercial and maritime concerns. London and Westminster are situated in Middlesex, on the N. side of the river Thames. Southwark is situated on the opposite bank, in Surrey. The extent of the whole, from Limehouse and Deptford to Milbank and Vauxhall, is about 7 m.; the breadth varies from 3 to 6.

The extension of this metropolis, since the middle of the last century, has proceeded with unprecedented rapidity, and covered the fields, gardens, and marshes in the vicinity of London with new squares and streets. The direction of the principal streets accompanies the course of the river Thames from east to west; and the cross streets run mostly in a transverse direction from north to south. There are two chief lines of streets from west to east: one of which commences at the north side of Hyde Park, and under the successive names of Oxford-street, St. Giles's, Holborn, Skinner-street, Newgate-street, Cheapside, Cornhill, and Leadenhall-street, is continued to White-chapel and Mile End, on the Essex road; the other begins at the south side of Hyde Park, and consists of Piccadilly, St. James's street, Pall Mall, Charing Cross, the Strand, Fleet-street, Ludgatehill, St. Paul's church-yard, Watling-street, Cannon-street, and Tower-street: whence crossing Tower-hill, it may be said to be further extended two miles along the river side, in Wapping. The streets near the river, and most of the cross ones in the city are very narrow; the broadest and handsomest are to the north of Oxford street and Holborn. They are well paved with granite stones, for the attempts at macadamizing have not succeeded in London, and on each side with flag-stones for the convenience of foot passengers. The subterranean works, constructed for the accommodation of the inhabitants, consisting of sewers, drains, water-pipes, and gas-pipes, are most extensive. The houses are mostly built of brick of a pale colour. The principal squares are Grosvenor, Portman, Berkeley, St. James, Hanover, Manchester, Cavendish, Bedford, Russel, Tavistock, Bloomsbury, Montague, Leicester, Bryanston, and Finsbury squares, and Lincoln's Inn Fields. Among the public buildings, St. Paul's cathedral is the most conspicuous. It is 2,292 feet in circumference, and 340 in height to the top of the cross, and is inferior to none in Europe except St. Peter's at Rome. It contains monuments of many illustrious individuals, who have done honour to their country by their talents or their virtues. Westminster Abbey is a grand specimen of Gothic architecture, said to have been founded by Sebert, king of the East Saxons, in 610. Here most of the English sovereigns have been crowned, and many of them interred. It contains also a great number of monuments erected to the memory of kings, statesmen, heroes, poets, and persons distinguished by genius, learning, and science. The chapel of Henry VII., adjoining, Leland calls The Wonder of the World. St. Stephen's, Walbrook, is a small church of exquisite beauty, the masterpiece of Sir Christopher Wren. Bow Church in Cheapside, St. Bride's in Fleet-street, St. Dunstan's in the East, and several others are worthy of notice; but the far greater number are of plain and ordinary architecture. The churches and chapels belonging to the establishment, in the bills of mortality, including those erected under the recent act of parliament, amount to 266. There are likewise a great number of meetings for Protestant dissenters of all persuasions, 30 foreign Protestant churches, 15 Roman Catholic chapels, and 6 synagogues for the Jews. Besides the royal palaces, there are many fine houses of the princes of the blood, and of the nobility and gentry. The Tower of London is very ancient, but the founder is uncertain. It is surrounded by a wall, and partly by a deep ditch. Here are the jewels and ornaments of the crown, as well as the other regalia; and the menagerie for foreign birds and beasts. The Mint, on Tower Hill, is a very elegant modern building of pure Grecian architecture. The bridges are a great ornament to the metropolis. The most ancient, London bridge, was begun in 1176, and finished in 1209. The length of it is 915 feet. The number of arches was 19, of unequal dimensions; through which, in consequence of their narrowness and clumsy construction, the current rushed with such force as to render the navigation extremely dangerous. This clumsy fabric is however about to be supplanted by the New London bridge, a noble structure of 5 arches, which is now rapidly approaching towards completion. Westminster bridge was commenced in 1730, and opened to the public in 1750. It is 1,223 feet in length, and has 13 large and two small semicircular arches. Blackfriars' bridge, built by Mylne, was completed in 1768. Its length is 995 feet; the breadth of the carriage-way 28, and of the foot-paths 7 feet each. It consists of 9 elliptical arches, the centre one of which is 100 feet wide; and both this and the arch on each side are wider than the celebrated Rialto at Venice. Waterloo bridge, commenced in 1811 and opened in 1816, in the anniversary of the battle which it is designed to commemorate, is one of the noblest structures of the kind in the world. It consists of 9 arches, each 120 feet span and 35 feet elevation. The other bridges are those of Southwark and Vauxhall. Among the other public buildings, which can merely be enumerated here, are Westminster Hall, containing the supreme courts of justice, and adjoining to which are the houses of Lords and Commons; the Sessions House; the Horse Guards, the Treasury, and the Admiralty, at Whitehall; the noble collection of public offices which form that magnificent structure called Somerset Place; the British Museum; the Royal Exchange; the Bank of England; the Excise Office; the East India House; the Mansion House, for the lord mayor, the Monument, in commemoration of the great fire in 1666; the New Post Office, in St. Martins-le-grand, opened in September, 1829; the Stock Exchange, the new Custom House; the new Corn Exchange, erected on the site of the old one in Mark Lane in 1829; the Herald's College; and the halls of the various city companies. The Adelphi-terrace is the admiration of foreigners, for the noble view which it affords of the river, the bridges and other public buildings, and of the fine hills beyond Lambeth and Southwark. The inns of court for the study of the law, the colleges, learned societies, and public seminaries; the noble hospitals and the other charitable institutions; the public places of diversion, &c., are too numerous to be mentioned.

Such, on a cursory view of it, is the metropolis of Great Britain, to the extent and opulence of which many causes have contributed. The broad stream of the Thames flowing between London and Southwark, continually agitated by a brisk current or a rapid tide, bring constant supplies of fresh air, which no buildings can intercept. The country around, especially on the London side, is nearly open to some distance; whence, by the action of the sun and winds on a gravelly soil, it is kept tolerably dry in all seasons, and affords no lodgment for stagnant air or water. The cleanliness of London, as well as its supply of water, is generally aided by its situation on the banks of the Thames; and the New River, with many good springs within the city itself, further contribute to the abundance of that necessary element. All these are advantages, with respect to health, in which this metropolis is exceeded by few. Its situation, with regard to the circumstance of navigation, is equally well chosen; had it been placed lower on the Thames, it would have been annoyed by the marshes; had it been higher, it would not have been accessible, as at present, to ships of large burden. It now possesses every advantage that can be derived from a sea-port, and at the same time, by means of its noble river and its canal navigation, enjoys a most extensive communication with the internal parts of the country, which supply it with necessities, and in return receive from it such commodities as they require. It contains several large wet docks, particularly those called the West India, the East India, the London, and St. Catherine's docks; also dry docks for repairing, and slips for building of ships, besides the king's yard at Deptford, for building men of war. London therefore unites in itself all the benefit arising from navigation and commerce, with those of a metropolis at which all the public business of a great nation is transacted; and is thus both the mercantile and political emporium of these kingdoms. It is the seat of many considerable manufactures; some almost peculiar to itself, as administering to the demands of studied splendor and refined luxury; others in which it participates with the manufacturing towns in general. The most important of its peculiar manufactures is the silk weaving established in Spitalfield by refugees from France. A variety of works in gold, silver, and jewelry, the engraving of prints, the making of optical and mathematical instruments are principally executed here, and some of them in greater perfection than in any other country. The porter-brewery, a business of immense extent, is also chiefly carried on in London. To its port are likewise confined some branches of foreign commerce, as the vast East India trade, and those to Turkey and Hudson's Bay. Thus London has risen to its present rank of the first city in Europe with respect to wealth and population.

The number of inhabitants in 1811 was 1,099,104, in 1821, 1,225,960; since which period it has been every year rapidly increasing. The city is divided into 26 wards, each governed by an alderman; and from the alderman the lord mayor is annually chosen. There are likewise 236 common-councilmen, a recorder, a common-serjeant, two sheriffs (who are also sheriffs of Middlesex), a chamberlain, a town-clerk, a city remembrancer, a water-bailiff, and many inferior officers. Westminster is governed by a high steward, who is generally a nobleman, chosen by the dean and chapter, and he has an under steward who officiates for him. Next to him is the high bailiff, chosen also by the dean and chapter, whose power resembles that of a sheriff. The suburbs are under the jurisdiction of justices of the peace for the county, and there are also several police offices where magistrates sit every day for the examination of offenders and the determination of various complaints in a summary way. During the last three years the police of the metropolis and suburbs has been strengthened by a new establishment, under the superintendence of a military officer, who receives instructions from the Home Department in Whitehall. The cost of this establishment will be greater by about 30 per cent, than that of the watchmen, which it has superseded. This, however, is more than compensated by its superior efficiency, the former "guardians of the night" being generally decrepid from age and infirmities, while the new police is entirely composed of men in the prime of life, and of unblemished character. Southwark was long independent of London, but Edward III. granted it to the city. It was then called the village of Southwark, and afterwards named the balliwic. In the reign of Edward VI. it was formed into a 26th ward, by the name of Bridge Ward Without. On the death of the alderman of this ward, he is succeeded by the next in seniority, to whatever ward he may belong, this ward being considered as a sinecure, and consequently the most proper for "the father of the city." The city has likewise a high bailiff and steward here. The city of London is a bishop's see, and is represented in parliament by four members, elected by the livery, two other members are elected by the householders of Westminster, and two by those of Southwark. To attempt an enumeration of the events by which this great capital has been distinguished, within the limits of a work like this, would of course be absurd; but we cannot omit to mention the plague, in 1665, which cut off 68,596 people, and the dreadful conflagration, in 1666, by which the cathedral and many other churches, with 13,200 houses, were destroyed. London is 225 m. N. N. W. of Paris, 395 S. of Edinburgh, and 338 E. S. E. of Dublin. Long. 0. 5. W., lat. 51. 31. N.

Londonderry, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, 40 English m. long and 33 broad; bounded on the W. by Donegal, N. by the ocean,

S. and S. W. by Tyrone, and E. by Antrim. It contains, according to the last census, 93,849 inhabitants, is divided into 31 parishes, and sends 2 members to parliament. It is a fruitful champagne country; and the greater part of it was given by James I. to an incorporated company of London merchants. The linen manufacture flourishes through every part of the city.

Londonderry, a city and sea-port of Ireland, capital of the foregoing county, and a bishop's see. It is still surrounded by walls, and celebrated for a long siege it sustained against James II. in 1689. It is governed by a mayor, and sends one member to parliament. The principal commerce is with America and the W. Indies. Including the suburbs, it contains 18,000 inhabitants, and is seated on the river Foyle, over which is a wooden bridge, 1,068 feet in length. Londonderry is 4 m. S. of Lough Foyle, and 115 N. W. of Dublin.

Londonderry, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H., with a manufacture of linen, cloth, and thread; seated near the head of Beaver River, which runs into the Merrimack, 38 m. S. S. W. of Portsmouth. Pop. 1,469.

Londonderry, p.t. Windham Co. Vt. 27 m. S. W. Windsor. Pop. 1,302; also towns in Chester, Dauphin, and Bedford Cos. Pa. and Guernsey Co. Ohio.

London Grove, p.t. Chester Co. Pa.

Longacoming, p.v. Gloucester Co. N. J., 16 m. S. E. Philadelphia.

Long, Loch, an arm of the sea in Scotland, which, from the frith of Clyde, extends 20 m. N. between the counties of Dumbarton and Argyle. It is from 1 to 2 m. in breadth; and near the middle, on the Argyle side, it sends off a small branch called Loch Goll.

Longford, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, 25 m. long and 20 broad; bounded on the N. W. by Leitrim, N. E. by Cavan, S. E. by West Meath, and W. by the river Shannon, which parts it from Roscommon. It is divided into 25 parishes, contains 107,576 inhabitants, and sends two members to parliament. The country in general is fertile, but interspersed in some parts with bogs, morasses, and forests; the flat parts, along the Shannon, are subject to inundation. It contains several lakes, and besides the Shannon is watered by the Inny, the Camlin, the Fallen, and numerous inferior streamlets. Oats form the chief article of agricultural export.

Longford, a borough of Ireland, capital of the above country. Much linen is manufactured in the town and neighbourhood, and great quantities of flax sent to other parts. It is seated on the Camlin, 70 m. (English) W. N. W. of Dublin. Long. 7. 40. W., lat. 52. 48. N.

Longforang, a town of Scotland, in the S. E. corner of Perthshire, on the frith of Tay, 4 m. W. by S. of Dundee.

Long Island, an island belonging to the State of New York, extending along the coast of Connecticut, from S. W. to N. E., about 140 m. in length and 10 m. in average breadth. It is divided into three counties, King, Queen's, and Suffolk. At the W. extremity it forms the bay of New York. On the side of the ocean the island is bordered by an immense beach of sand. In other parts it is much indented with numerous bays; and Gardiner's Bay, with several others, occupies an extent of near 30 m. at the E. end. These bays also encompass many islands, several of which are of considerable extent. A ridge or drain of low hills extends from the west end to the eastern extremity. The waters are stored with a vast abundance and variety of fish, and Long Island has long been celebrated for its wild fowl and various forest game. Much of the land in the east is a light sand, still clothed with vast forests of pine: and in these are found abundance of game.

East of the Hempstead plains, the island is covered with shrubby oaks and pines, called the brushy plains; and here are found the grouse, or, heath-hens. Farther eastward, towards Islip and Fire-place, are streams where there is good trout fishing; and towards the centre of the island, is plenty of wild deer, that are hunted and killed by way-laying them as they are driven along by hounds. In October and November, brant, wild geese, and other waterfowl, are killed in great numbers along the bays and inlets. Deer cannot lawfully be killed on Long Island from January to July; nor heath-hens, partridges, quails, or woodcocks, from 1st April to 5th October.

The face of the country on the north side of the island is hilly, and in some places full of rocky boulders; while on the south, the country is mostly free from large stones, and presents a gradual slope towards the ocean, which appears to have formerly washed the base of the hills.

Long Island Sound, is from 3 to 25 m. broad, extending the whole length of Long Island, and dividing it from Connecticut. It communicates with the Atlantic at the E. end of the island, and with the harbour of New York at the W.

Long-nan, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Se-tchuen. Long. 104. 18. E., lat. 32. 22. N.

Longnor, a town of Staffordshire, Eng. seated near the river Dove, 31 m. N. by E. of Stafford, and 152 N. N. W. of London.

Longtown, a town in Cumberland, Eng. seated on the Esk, 9 m. N. of Carlisle, and 310 N. N. W. of London.

Longtown, p.v. Rowan Co. N. C. 150 m. W. Raleigh.

Longue, a town of France, department of Maine-et-Loire, 7 m. N. of Saumur.

Longuion, a town of France, department of Moselle. Here is a considerable iron forge and cannon foundry. 10 m. S. W. of Longwy, and 36 N. W. of Ments.

Longwy, a town of France, department of Moselle with a castle. It is divided into the Old and New town, the latter of which is fortified. It is seated on a rocky eminence, on the river Chiers, 32 m. N. N. W. of Metz. Long. 5. 44. E., lat. 49. 32. N.

Lonicera, p.v. Baldwin Co. Geo.

Lons le Saulnier, a town of France, capital of the department of Jura. It derives its name from the salt springs in its vicinity, and is seated on the Solvan, 62 m. S. E. of Dijon. Long. 5. 30. E., lat. 46. 37. N.

Loo, a town of the Netherlands, in W. Flanders, 10 m. N. N. W. of Ypres.

Loo-choo, or Licou-kio, the general name of 36 islands lying between Formosa and Japan. The Great Loo-choo is 50 m. long and from 12 to 15 broad; the others are inconsiderable. They were very imperfectly known to Europeans, till visited by captain Hall and Mr. M'Leod on their return from the late embassy to China. The climate and soil seem to be among the happiest on the globe. The fruits and vegetable productions are of the most exquisite description. The inhabitants are diminutive in their stature, but strong, and well made. Their disposition appears to be peculiarly gay, hospitable, and affectionate, but they showed that strong aversion to receive strangers into their country which is characteristic of China, Japan, and all the neighbouring regions. The king is tributary to China, and the government resembles that of the Chinese. The capital is Kin-tching, about 5 m. from its port of Napa-kiang. Long. 127. 52. E., lat. 26. 14. N.

Looe, East and West, two decayed boroughs in Cornwall, Eng. separated by a creek, over which is a narrow stone bridge. They are supported chiefly by the pilchard fishery, and an inconsiderable coasting trade. Together they send as many members to parliament as the city of London. The market, held at East Looe, is on Saturday. 13 m. W. of Plymouth, and 233 W. by S. of London.

Lookout, Cape, a cape of N. Carolina, S. of Cape Hatteras, and opposite Core Sound. Long. 76. 48. W., lat. 34. 22. N.

Lookout Mountain, a ridge in the Northwestern part of Georgia extending to Tennessee river.

Looz, or Lootz, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of Liege, 14 m. N. N. W. of Liege.

Lopalka, Cape, the S. extremity of Kamtschaka. Long. 156. 45. E., lat. 51. 0. N. See Kuriles.

Lopham, North and South, two adjoining parishes in Norfolk, 4 m. S. E. of East Harling.

Lopo Gonsalve, Cape, a long and narrow peninsula on the coast of Guinea, low, flat, and covered with trees. It affords a good harbour, and near the cape is a village, where provisions are plentiful. Long. 8. 30. E., lat. 0. 45. S.

Loop, p.v. Giles Co. Va. 274 m. W. Richmond.

Lora, a town of Spain, in Seville, on the Guadalquivir, 28 m. N. E. of Seville.

Loramie, a township of Shelby Co. Ohio.

Lorain, a county of Ohio. Pop. 5,696. Elyria is the capital.

Lorbus (the ancient Laribus Colonia), a town of the kingdom of Tunis, with a castle, and fine remains of antiquity. It is seated in a plain, fertile in corn, 150 m. S. W. of Tunis. Long. 9. 0. E., lat. 35. 35. N.

Lorca, a town of Spain, in Murcia, divided into the Upper and Lower Town. The former has narrow, crooked, and ill paved streets; the latter is regularly and neatly built. It contains nine churches and several monasteries, and has extensive manufactures of saltpetre. In 1802 the bursting of an immense reservoir, containing water for the purpose of irrigation, occasioned much damage to the town. It is seated on an eminence near the Sengonera. 40 m. W. S. W. of Murcia. Long. 1. 22. W., lat. 37. 25. N.

Lord Howe's Group, an extensive group of islands, in the S. Pacific, thickly covered with wood, among which the cocoa-nut is very distinguishable. The natives are of a dark copper colour; their hair tied in a knot on the back of the head; and they seem to have some method of taking off the beard; for they appear as clean shaved. Their arms and thighs are tattooed in the manner described by Captain Cook of some of the natives of the islands he visited in these seas; and some are painted with red and white streaks.—They wear a wrapper round their middle. Long. from 159. 15. to 159. 37. E., lat. 5. 30. S.

Lord Howe's Island, an island in the Pacific Ocean, discovered in 1788 by lieutenant King. Many excellent turtle have been caught here on a sandy beach; and it abounds with a variety of birds, which were so unaccustomed to be disturbed that the seamen went near enough to knock them down with a stick. At its end are two high mountains, nearly perpendicular from the sea, the southernmost named Mount Gower. About 14 m. to the S. is a remarkable rock, named Ball's Pyramid, which at a distance, had much the appearance of a steeple. The island is 3.1-2 m. long and very narrow. Long. 159. 0. E., lat. 31. 36. N.

Lorenzo, San, a town of Mexico, province of New Biscay, with 500 inhabitants, whose employment consists in cultivating the grape.—There are numerous settlements and inconsiderable islands of this name in South America.

Loren, a town of Austrian Italy, in Rivigo, on the Adige, 20 m. E. of Rivigo.

Loretto, a fortified town of Italy, in the papal states. The cathedral contains the Casa Santa or Holy House, in which it is pretended the virgin Mary lived at Nazareth. According to the legend, it was carried by angels from Galilee into Dalmatia, and thence to the place where it now stands. This house, or chapel, is 31 feet long, 15 broad, and 18 high; the inner part very old, but cased with marble on the outside. The famous lady of Loretto, who holds the infant Jesus in her arms, stands upon the principal altar, in a niche of silver; this statue is of cedar wood, three feet high, but her face can hardly be seen, on account of the numerous gold and silver lamps around her. She is clothed with cloth of gold, set off with jewels; and the little Jesus is covered with a shirt, holds a globe in his hand, and is adorned with rich jewels. Those who go on pilgrimage to Loretto, after having performed their devotion, make the Virgin a present; so that the treasure of this chapel is immensely rich. The inhabitants of this town subsist principally by agriculture and gardening, and many of them are shoemakers, tailors, and sellers of chaplets. Loretto was taken by the French in 1796, and the church despoiled of its treasures: even the Virgin was carried away but restored in 1802. It is seated on a mountain, 3 m. from the gulf of Venice, 12 S. E. of Ancona, and 115 N. E. of Rome. Long. 13. 36. E., lat. 43. 27. N.

Loretto, p.v. Essex Co. Va. 75 m. N. E. Richmond.

Lorgues, a town of France, in Provence, on the Argens, 16 m. W. of Frejus.

L'Orient, a fortified modern sea-port of France, department of Morbihan. It is built with considerable regularity; the streets are wide, the public squares spacious and handsome, and the harbour large, secure, and easy of access. Formerly it was a very flourishing town, the French East India Company making it the exclusive entrepot of their imported goods. It has still some trade, and is a place of importance on account of its magazines for the navy. The chief manufacture is of salt. The British made an unsuccessful attempt upon it in 1746. It is seated on the bay of Port Louis, at the influx of the Scorf, 340 m. W. by S. of Paris. Long. 3. 20. W., lat. 49. 44. N.

Lorbeck, a town of Germany, in Baden, 6 m. N. E. of Bale.

Lorraine, an extensive district of the N. E. of France, between Champagne and Alsace, and now forming the departments of Meurthe, Moselle, and Vosges. It abounds in all sorts of corn, wine, hemp, flax, and rape-seed.

Lossiemouth, a village of Scotland, in Murray shire, at the mouth of the river Lossie, 7 m. N. E. of Elgin, of which it is the port.

Lost Creek, a township of Miami Co. Ohio.

Lot, a river of France, which rises in the department of Lozere, begins to be navigable at Cahors, and enters the Garonne near Aiguillon.

Lot, a department of France, consisting of the former district of Quercy, in Guienne. It takes its name from the river Lot, which crosses it from E. to W. It is bounded on the N. by Correze, E. by Cantal and Aveyron, S. by Tarn-et-Garonne, and W. by Lot-et-Garonne and Dordogne. Its pastures feed numerous flocks, which constitute a great part of the commerce. The climate is mild and healthy; and the soil, consisting of fat rich earth, is cultivated with horses, and yields more than sufficient for its population, estimated at 275,296. Cahors is the capital.

Lot-et-Garonne, a department of France, including part of the former province of Guienne, bounded on the N. by Dordogne, E. by Tarn-et-Garonne, S. by Gers, and W. by Landes and the Gironde. It has its name from the rivers Lot and Garonne. Its pastures are but indifferent, and artificial meadows are little known. The land, being much covered with heath, is cultivated with oxen; and a large proportion of the department is incapable of cultivation, consisting of rugged hills or sandy deserts. Agen is the capital.

Lotinbiere, a seigniority of Buckingham Co. L. C. on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, 40 m. above Quebec.

Lothian. See Haddingtonshire, Edinburghshire, and Linlithgowshire.

Loudeac, a town of France, department of Cotes du Nord, 25 m. S. of St Brieux.

Loudon, a county of the E. district of Virginia, on the Potomac, adjoining Fairfax, Berkley, and Fauquier counties. It is about 50 m. in length and 20 in breadth. Pop. 21,938. Leesburg is the chief town.

Loudon, a town of France, department of Vienne, 30 m. N. W. of Poitiers.

Loudon, p.t. Merrimack Co. N. H. on the E. side of the Merrimack, 45 m. N. W. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,642; also a p.v. Franklin Co. Pa. 63 m. S. W. Harrisburg.

Loughborough, a township in Frontenac Co. U. C.

Loughborough, a town in Leicestershire, Eng. It has a large church, with a handsome tower, seven meeting-houses for dissenters; also a free grammar school, and a charity school. The chief manufactures are those of cotton spinning, lace, and hosiery. By means of the Loughborough canal, the river, and rail-roads, it carries on a brisk trade particularly in coals. Many of the houses have an old and irregular appearance, but great improvement have lately taken place. It is seated near the Soar, 11 m. N. of Leicester, and 109 N. N. W. London.

Loughrea, a town of Ireland, in the county of Galway, near a lake of the same name, 15 m. S. W. of Galway.

Louhans, a town of France, department of Upper Saone, situate on a kind of island between the rivers Seilles. Vailiere, and Solman, 18 m. S. E. of Chalons.

Louisa, a county of the E. district of Virginia. Pop. 16,151; also a p.v. Lawrence Co. Ken. 180 m. E. Frankfort.

Louis, Fort, an important barrier fortress of France, in Alsace, on the Rhine, 12 m. E. of Haguenau.

Louis, St. an island of Africa, at the mouth of the river Senegal, with a fort, built by the French. It was taken in 1758 by the English, and ceded to them in 1763. In the American war, it was taken by the French, and kept by them after the peace of 1783. It is flat, sandy and barren. Long. 16. 15. W., lat. 16. 0. N.

Louis, St. a sea-port and fortress of St. Domingo, on the S. W. coast, at the head of a bay of its name. The exports are coffee, cotton, and indigo, 70 m. W. S. W. of Port au Prince. Long. 73. 32. W., lat. 18. 16. N.

Louis, Fort, an important barrier fortress in the N. E. of France, constructed by Vauban in 1686; on an island in the Rhine. 12. m. E. Haguenau.

Louis de Ramsay, seigniority, Richelieu Co. Lower Canada.

Louisiade, an archipelago in the eastern seas, lying S. E. of New Guinea, and extending about 400 m. in length, by about 160 in breadth. The centre lies nearly under 10. S. lat. and 152. 25. E. long.

Louis, St. a lake of N. America, formed by the junction of the Ottawa with the St. Lawrence. It is 12 m. long and 6 broad.

Louis, St. a river N. America, which has its source near the eastern head waters of the Mississippi, and falls into lake Superior, on the west shore. It is navigable 150 m. Long. 91. 52. W., lat. 46. 44. N.

Louis de Maranhão, St., a sea-port of Brazil capital of the island of Maranhão, and a bishop's see, with a strong castle. It is the residence of a captain general, and contains a custom-house and treasury. The churches and convents are numerous, and the houses, though only one story high, are many of them neat. The harbour is tolerably large, but the entrance is difficult. It stands on the E. side of the river Mearim, near the Atlantic Ocean. Long. 43. 37. W., lat. 2 30. S.

Louisa, a town of European Russia, on a bay of the gulf of Finland, 30 m. E. N. E. of Helsingfors.

Louisburg, the capital of the island of Cape Breton, with a citadel, and an excellent harbour, nearly four leagues in circumference. It was taken by the English in 1745, restored to the French in 1748, taken by the English in 1758, and ceded to them in 1763. The chief source of trade is the cod-fishery. Long. 59. 55. W., lat. 45. 54. N.

Louisburg, p.t. Franklin Co. N. C. on Tar river, 23 m. N. E. Raleigh.

Louisiana, one of the United States, bounded N. by the territory of Arkansas and the State of Mississippi, E. by Mississippi, S. by the Gulf of Mexico, and W. by the Mexican province of Texas. It extends from 29. to 33. N. lat. and from 89. to 94. W. long. and contains 48,220 square miles. It is intersected by the Mississippi, Red and Washita rivers and many inferior streams: the western limit is washed by the Sabine.

Three quarters of this state are without an elevation, that can properly be called a hill. The pine woods generally have a surface of a very particular character, rising into fine swells, with table surfaces on the summit, and valleys from thirty to forty feet deep. But they are without any particular range, and like the waves of a high and regular sea. The alluvial soil of course is level, and the swamps, which are only inundated alluvions, are dead flats. A range of hills commences in gentle elevations in Opelousas, rises gradually and diverges towards the Sabine. In the vicinity of Natchitoches it preserves a distance, intermediate between the Sabine and Red rivers, and continues to increase in elevation to the western parts of the state. Seen from the pine hills above Natchitoches, they have in the distance, the blue outline, and the general aspect of a range of mountains. Another line of hills, not far from Alexandria, commences on the north side of Red river, and separating between the waters of that river and Dugdemony, unites with another line of singular shaped mamelle hills, that bound the alluvions of the Washita, as bluffs, gradually diverging from that river as they pass beyond the western limits of the state. That very remote part of the parish of Natchitoches, called Allen's settlement, is a high and rolling country. There are also considerable hills beyond the Mississippi alluvions east of that river. But, generally speaking, Louisiana may be considered as one immense plain, divided, as respects its surface, into pine woods, prairies, alluvions, swamps, and hickory and oak lands.

The pine woods are generally rolling; sometimes, but not often level. They have almost invariably a poor soil. The greater proportion of the prairies is second rate land. Some of those west of Opelousas, and between Washita and Red river are even sterile. Some parts of the prairies of Opelousas are of great fertility, and those of Attakapas still more so. As a general fact, they are more level, than those of the upper country. A large belt of these prairies near the gulf is low, marshy, and in rainy weather inundated. A very considerable extent of them has a cold clayey soil, with a hard crust near the surface. In other places the soil is of inky blackness, and disposed in the hot and dry season to crack in fissures of a size to admit a man's arm.

The bottoms are generally rich, but in very different degrees. Those of the Mississippi and Red river, and the bayous connected with those streams, are more fertile and productive, than the streams west of them, and between them and the Sabine. The fertility of the richer bottoms of the Mississippi and Red river is sufficiently attested by the prodigious growth of the timber, the luxuriance, size and rankness of the cane, and the cotton, the tangles of vines and creepers, the astonishing size of the weeds, and the strength of vegetation in general.

The most fertile district of Louisiana is a belt of land called the coast lying along the Mississippi in the neighbourhood of New Orleans. It consists of that part of the bottom or alluvion of the Mississippi, which commences with the first cultivation above the Balize, about forty miles below New Orleans and extends 150 m. above the city. This belt, on each side of the river, is secured by an embankment called a levee, from six to eight feet in height, and sufficiently broad, for the most part to furnish a fine high way.—The river in ordinary inundations would cover the greater part of this belt from two to six feet in depth. It is from one to two miles in width, and perhaps a richer tract of land in the same extent can not be found on the globe. The levee extends something higher on the west, than on the east side of the river. Above the levee on the east bank of the river are the parishes of Baton Rouge, and East and West Feliciana. The latter parish received its name from its pleasant surface of fertile hills and valleys, and its union of desirable circumstances for a planting country. This parish presents a spectacle, very uncommon in this country; the hills are covered with laurels, and forest trees, that denote the richest soils and which are uncommonly productive. Here are some of the richest planters and best plantations in the state. The mouth of Bayou Sarah, the point of shipment for this region, sends great quantities of cotton to New Orleans. Some of the plantations on this Bayou have from five to eight hundred acres under cultivation, worked by a large number of hands.

West of the Mississippi, the Bayous Lafourche and Plaquemine, effluxes, or outlets from the Mississippi, have the same conformation of banks and the same qualities of soil with the parent stream; and, where not inundated, are equally fertile. The sugar cane thrives as well upon their banks. No inconsiderable portion of Attakapas is of great fertility, as are smaller portions of Opelousas, which is, however, more generally adapted to become a grazing country. The Teche, which meanders through Opelousas and Attakapas has generally a very fertile alluvion, the lower courses of which are embellished with fine plantations of the sugar cane. On the Atchafalaya the lands are rich, but too generally inundated. The Courtableau, running through Opelousas, has probably as rich a soil, as is to be found in that parish. Approaching Red River from Opelousas, by Bayou Boeuf, we find on that bayou a soil, which some consider the richest cotton land in Louisiana. Bayou Rouge has also a fine soil, though it is as yet principally in a state of nature. Bayou Robert, still nearer to Red river, is of extraordinary fertility, and the cane brake along its bank is of astonishing luxuriance. Bayou Rapide, which gives name to the parish, through which it runs, is a beautiful tract of land; and the belt on either bank is laid out along its whole course in fine cotton plantations.

The bottoms of Red river itself are well known, as having a soil of extraordinary fertility: and the lower courses of this river constitute the paradise of cotton planters. The colour of the soil is of a darkish red, and appears to derive its great fertility from a portion of salt intimately mixed with it, and from its peculiar friability. It derives its red colour from red oxide of iron. It is a wide and deep valley, covered, while is a state of nature, with a dark and heavy forest. Its soil has been accumulating for unknown ages from the spoils of the Mexican mountains, and the vast prairies through which it rolls in its upper courses. All the bayous of Red river, and they are numerous almost beyond computation, partake of the character of the main river.

Vast extents of marsh interpose between the sea and the cultivable lands. The lakes and inlets and sounds are connected by an inextricable tissue of communications and passes accessible by small vessels and bay craft, and impossible to be navigated except by pilots, perfectly acquainted with the waters. The shore is indented by numberless small bays, very few of them affording sufficient water to shelter vessels. Berwick's bay is the only one that has any considerable extent.

A very great proportion of the surface of this state is covered with prairies. Almost all these prairies are connected, and form, like the waters of the Mississippi, a family, through which the connection of all the branches may be traced. The prairies, that are included under the general name of Attakapas, are the first, that occur west of the Mississippi. The parish of Attakapas is situated in these prairies. The name implies 'man eater,' in the language of the savages who formerly inhabited it, and who are reported to have been cannibals. It is an immense plain of grass, spreading from the Atchafalaya on the north to the gulf on the south. Its contents are commonly stated at 5,000 square miles. But it is thought this computation is too large. Being open to the gulf, it is generally fanned by the refreshing breezes of that sea. Its aspect of extreme fertility, its boundless plain of grass, its cheering views, its dim verdant outline, mingling with the blue of the sea, white houses seen in the distance, innumerable cattle and horses grazing in the plain, or reposing here and there under the shade of its wooded points, has an indescribable pleasantness to the traveller, who has been toiling on his way through the tangle, and the swamps, and along the stagnant lakes, and the dark and deep forest of the Mississippi bottom. All at once he leaves the stifling air, the muschetoos, the rank cane, the annoying nettles, and the dark brown shade, and emerges into this noble and cheerful plain, and feels the cool and salubrious breeze of the gulf.

Opelousas prairie is still larger than the other, and computed to contain nearly 8,000 sq. m. It is divided by bayous, wooded grounds, points and bends, and other natural boundaries, into a number of prairies, which have separate names and marks of distinction. Taken in its whole extent, it is bounded by the Attakapas prairie on the east, pine woods and hills on the north, the Sabine on the west, and the gulf on the south. The soil, though in many places very fertile, is in general less so than the former. It atones for that deficiency by being more salubrious, being generally deemed the healthiest region in the state. There are here considerable cotton plantations, and some of indigo; and the parish which bears its name, is one of the most populous in the state. The people of the other parish are devoted to the growth of the sugar cane. This is the centre of the land of shepherds, and the paradise of those who deal in cattle. The greater number of the people are chiefly devoted to that employment and they number their cattle by thousands.

Bellevue prairie is partly in Opelousas. partly in Attakapas. Calcaasiu and Sabine prairies are names that designate the different forms, shapes and openings of this continuous line of prairies, as it stretches along the settlements from the Plaquemine to the Sabine.

Some of them, as Opelousas, are of immense extent. That of the Sabine is boundless to the vision. Calcaasiu is seventy miles long by twenty wide. They are generally so level, as to strike the eye as a perfect plain. They have, however, slight swells and declinations, sufficient to carry the water from them. Though after long rains they are extremely wet, and immense tracts are covered with water. They have a gentle and imperceptible slope towards the gulf, and generally terminate, before they reach the shore, in wet marshes, into which, when the south wind blows, the sea is driven. These marshes are covered with a luxuriant growth of tall, reedy grass, called cane grass.—In various parts of these prairies, there are islands of timbered lands. They generally have an appearance of such regularity and beauty, that a stranger is with difficulty convinced, that they are not clumps of trees, planted out in circular, square, or triangular form for the beauty of their appearance. It would be impossible to convey to one, who has not felt it, an idea of the effect produced by one of these circular clumps of trees, seeming a kind of tower of verdure, rising from an ocean of grass. Wherever a bayou, or a stream crosses the prairie, it is marked with a fringe of timber, which strikes the eye of an observer, like the lines of trees in landscape painting. All the rivers, lakes and bayous of this State abound with alligators. On Red river before it was navigated by steamboats it was not uncommon to see hundreds at a time along the shores or on the immense rafts of floating or stranded timber, groaning or uttering their bellowing noises like thousands of furious bulls about to fight, and huddling together so closely that the smaller ones would get upon the backs of the larger. At one period thousands of them were killed for the sake of their skins which were made into leather for shoes, boots, &c. But it was found that this leather was not sufficiently fine and close grained to keep out the water. The alligators, are sometimes 12 and 15 feet in length, and are found in all the states south of North Carolina.

The climate of Louisiana is hot and moist. In summer it is extremely unhealthy, especially in the neighbourhood of marshy spots. It is however favourable to almost every vegetable production of warm countries. Here flourish the sugar cane, orange, lemon, cotton-plant, tobacco, rice, maize, sweet potato, &c. Sugar and cotton are the staple articles of cultivation. The sugar cane is principally raised upon that tract called the coast, upon the shores of the gulf, and upon the bayous of the Mississippi. The capital invested in sugar estates was estimated in 1828 at 45,000,000 dollars: the produce of sugar for the same year, was 88,878,000 pounds. The commerce of the state consists in the exportation of these products, and a great variety of others brought down the Mississippi from the western states. New Orleans is the centre of commerce for the state. The imports for 1829 were valued at 6,857,209 dollars; the exports of domestic produce at 10,898,183 dollars; total exports 12,386,060. The shipping of the state in 1828 amounted to 51,903 tons. The pop. is 215,575. of whom 109,631 are slaves.

The inhabitants of the state consist of remnants of the former Spanish and French possessors intermixed with Americans. The French are very numerous and exhibit in their manners the customary gaiety and volatility of that nation. This is one of the few states in the Union where the slaves exceed the freemen. The Catholics are the most numerous religious sect; they have above 20 parishes in the state. The Baptists have 14 ministers; the Methodists 6; the Presbyterians 5, and the Episcopalians 3. The state is divided into the Eastern and Western Districts, which are subdivided into 31 parishes. New Orleans is the seat of government. The Legislature is styled the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The senators are chosen for 4 years and the Representatives for 2. The Governor is chosen for 4 years, and is elected by the legislature from the highest two previously voted for by the people. Suffrage is universal. There are colleges in this state at Jackson and New Orleans, but general education has received little care.

This state consists of the Southern part of the extensive country purchased by the United States from France in 1803 for 15,000,000 dollars. It was first settled by the French, and afterwards occupied by the Spanish, but subsequently came again into the hands of the French. Louisians under its present limits was admitted into the Union as a state in 1812.

Louisiana, p.v. Pike Co. Missouri, on the Mississippi. 96 m. N. W. St. Louis.

Louisville, p.t. Jefferson Co. Kentucky, on the south bank of the Ohio, at the falls. This is a busy and flourishing town, situated upon a sloping plain at the junction of Beargrass Creek with the Ohio. The chief declivity of the falls begins a quarter of a mile below the town. The three principal streets run parallel with the river, and command a pleasant view of the opposite shore. The streets are paved with blocks of lime-stone. The buildings are mostly of brick. The town has considerable manufactures and a thriving river trade. Pop. 10,352.

Louisville and Portland Canal, passes round the falls of the Ohio, through the town above mentioned to Portland below. It is 2 m. in length and is cut through a limestone rock. It has several locks which overcome a descent of 24 feet. It admits the passage of the largest steam-boats and thus opens a line of free navigation from Pittsburgh to the sea. This canal was finished in 1831.

Louis, St. a county of Missouri, on the Mississippi. Pop. 14,907.

Louis, St. the capital of the above county, and the chief commercial town in the state of Missouri, stands on the Mississippi, 18 below the mouth of the Missouri, on a gently rising ground and is accessible by steam-boats from New Orleans at the lowest stages of the water. The town was founded by the French from Canada in 1764 and many of the inhabitants are still French. Here is a Catholic college and cathedral. A considerable part of the western fur-trade centres here, and the town is otherwise well situated for commerce. The passage to New Orleans is 1,200 m. by the river, and there are 6 steam-boats constantly plying between these two places. There are also the same number constantly running between this place and Louisville, besides others to different places. The town is regularly laid out and extends 2 m. along the river. Pop. 5,852. Lat. 38. 28. N., long. 89. 56. W.

Lubec, a free city and sea-port of Germany adjoining the duchy of Holstein. It was the head of the famous Hanseatic league, formed here in 1164, and the most commercial city of the north; but great part of its trade is transferred to Hamburg. The city is surrounded with walls, which are planted with rows of trees, but the other defences were demolished by the French, to whom it was surrendered in 1806. The houses are built of stone in a very ancient style. The town-house is a superb structure, and has several towers. There is also a fine council-house, and an exchange. The inhabitants are Lutherans. There are four large churches, besides the cathedral. The trade consists in the export of corn from the adjoining country and the import of articles for consumption; and the manufactures, which are on a small scale, comprise woolen, silks, cotton, tobacco, soap, white lead, copper, &c. Lubec is seated on the Trave, 8 m. S. W. of the Baltic, and 36 N. E. of Hamburg. Long. 10. 49. E., lat. 53. 52. N.

Lucerne, a canton of Switzerland, containing a superficial extent of 740 sq. m.; and bounded by the cantons of Underwalden, Schweitz, and Zurich. The air is mild, and the soil uncommonly fertile. Freedom and openness of manners characterize the inhabitants, who are Roman Catholics, and computed at 87,000.

Lucerne, the capital of the above canton, is divided into two parts by a branch of the Reuss, which here enters the lake of Lucerne. It has no manufactures of consequence, and little commerce, the merchants being principally engaged in the commission business, upon goods passing between Italy, and Germany, over Mount St. Gothard and the Lucerne Lake. 30 m. S. W. of Zurich, and 43 E. of Berne. Long. 8. 14. E., lat. 47. 0. N.

Lucerne, or Waldstadt, a lake of Switzerland, between the cantons of Underwalden, Lucerne, Schweitz, and Uri. It consists of a number of detached parts, forming in a manner separate lakes. It is the largest, as well as the most romantic lake in the interior of Switzerland, being 25 m. long and from 2 to 4 broad.

Luneburg, a town of Hanover, in the duchy of Luneburg, seated on the Jeetze, 36 m. S. of Luneburg.

Lucia, St., one of the Caribbee islands, 27 m. long and 12 broad. It consists of plains well watered with rivulets, and hills, furnished with timber; and has several good bays and commodious harbours. By the peace of 1763, this island was allotted to France. In 1803 it was taken by the English, and confirmed to them by the treaty of Paris in 1814. There are two high mountains, by which this island may be known at a considerable distance. Its N. end is 21 m. S. of Martinique. Long. 60. 51. W., lat. 14. 0. N.

Luconia, or Manilla, the chief of the Philippine islands, 400 m. in length, and 100 in breadth. It is not so hot as might be expected, being well watered by large lakes and rivers, and the periodical rains, which inundate the plains. There are several volcanoes in the mountains, which occasion earthquakes. The produce is wax, cotton, indigo, tobacco, sugar, coffee, wild cinnamon, sulphur, cocoa-nuts, rice, &c. Gold is found in various parts of the island; and horses, buffaloes, and a variety of game abound. The inhabitants are for the most part a well disposed people, and before their subjugation were distributed into mud villages. Under the tyranny of the Spanish government they have become indolent, and destitute of energy. The interior, however, is occupied by a savage race, whom the Spaniards have not been able to subdue. They carry on a small traffic in gold, wax, and tobacco, in exchange for cattle. Long. 122. 0. E., lat. 15. 0. N.

Lure, a town of France, department of Upper Saone, celebrated for a late abbey of Benedictines, converted, in 1764, into a chapter of noble canons. It is seated near the Ougnon, 30 m. N. E. of Besançon.

Lurgan, a town of Ireland, in the county of Armagh, with an extensive linen manufacture, 14 m. N. E. of Armagh, and 67 N. of Dublin.

Lusatia, a margraviate of Germany, 90 m. long and 60 broad; bounded on the N. by Brandenburg, E. by Silesia, S. by Bohemia, and W. by Saxony. It is divided into Upper and Lower Lusatia, formerly two distinct states, which became subject to Saxony and formed a province of that power until 1815. The whole of Lower Lusatia, which forms the northern part of the margraviate now belongs to Prussia, as does also one half of Upper Lusatia, which is included in the government of Liegnitz: the part that remains to Saxony is computed at 1,170 sq. m. with 170,000 inhabitants. Upper Lusatia abounds more in mountains and hills than the Lower, in which are many boggy and moorish tracts, yet it is the most fruitful. The breeding of cattle is very considerable, and there is plenty of game; but the products of the country do not supply the necessities of the inhabitants. This want is compensated by its numerous manufactures, particularly those of cloths and linens.

Lusignan, a town of France, department of Vienne, seated on the Vonne, 15 m. S. S. W. of Poitiers.

Lutterworth, a town in Leicestershire, Eng. It has a large and handsome church. Wickliff, the celebrated reformer, was rector, and died here, in 1387. Lutterworth has little trade, being principally supported by the neighbouring opulent graziers. It is seated on the river Swift, 14 m. S. of Leicester, and 88 N. W. of London.

Lutzelstein, a town of France, department of Lower Rhine, with a strong castle, seated on a mountain, 30 m. N. W. of Strasburg.

Lutzen, a town of Saxony, in the principality of Merseberg, belonging to Prussia, with a castle. Near this place, in 1632, Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, was killed in a battle, at the moment of victory. Lutzen is also celebrated for the defeat of the united forces of Russia and Prussia, by Bonaparte, in May, 1813. It is seated on the Elster, 21 m. W. S. W. of Leipzig.

Luxemburg, a province of the Netherlands, bounded by the Prussian states on the Rhine, a part of the French frontier, and the Belgic provinces of Namur and Liege, and comprising a superficial area of 2,400 sq. m. with 226,000 inhabitants. It gives the title of grand duke to the sovereign. The surface is mountainous and woody, being traversed by branches of the Ardennes; and the climate is colder than that of the other provinces. The principal river is the Moselle. Corn, potatoes, flax, and some wine are raised; the rearing of cattle forms an important branch of industry; and there are manufactures of woolen and iron; but the chief wealth of the province consists in its forests, which occupy upwards of 460,000 acres. It is divided into the districts of Luxemburg, Dietkirch and Neufchateau.

Luxemburg, the capital of the above province, and one of the strongest towns in Europe. It is divided by the Alsatz into the Upper and Lower Town; the former almost surrounded by rocks, but the latter seated in a plain. In 1795 it surrendered to the French, but was restored in 1814. It is 22 m. W. S. W. of Treves, and 130 S. E. of Brussels. Long. 6. 10. E., lat. 49. 37. N.

Lyonnois, a former province of France, lying on the W. side of the Saone and Rhone, 30 m. in length, and 17 in breadth. This province, with Forez and Beaujolois, now forms the department of the Rhone and the Loire.

Lyons, a city of France, capital of the department of Rhone, and the see of an archbishop. Many antiquities are still observed, which evince its Roman origin. It was long considered as the second city of France in beauty, size, and population, and superior to Paris in trade, commerce, and manufactures. The quays were adorned with magnificent structures; the cathedral was a majestic Gothic edifice; and the town-house was one of the most beautiful in Europe. The other principal public buildings were the exchange, the custom-house, the palace of justice, the arsenal, a theatre, a public library, two colleges, and two hospitals. The bridge which unites the city with the suburb de la Guillotiere is 1,560 feet long; and there are three other principal suburbs, six gates, and several fine churches. Such was Lyons in June 1793, when it revolted against the national convention. Being obliged to surrender, in October, the convention decreed that the walls and public buildings should be destroyed, and the name of the city changed to that of Ville Affranchie. The chiefs of the insurgents had fled, but several of them were afterwards taken; and of 3,528 persons, who were tried before the revolutionary tribunal, 1,682 were either shot or beheaded. In 1794, however, on the destruction of the faction of the jacobins, the convention decreed that the city should resume its ancient name, and that measures should be taken to restore its manufactures and commerce. In 1795 the friends of those who were so wantonly put to death in 1793 avenged their fate by a general massacre of the judges of the revolutionary tribunal, and of all the jacobins who were then confined in the prisons of Lyons. Notwithstanding, Lyons has begun to resume its ancient celebrity, and is now a place of very great trade, which is extended not only through France, but to Italy, Switzerland, and Spain; and there are four celebrated fairs every year. The chief article of manufacture now is that of silk: the others are gold and silver brocade, plain, double, and striped velvet, richly embroidered taffeta, and satin; also gold and silver laces or galoons, gauze, hats, ribands, leather, carpets, and colored paper. The printing and book-selling of this place are the next to Paris in importance. It was the scene of several actions between the French and Austrians in 1814; and on the return of Bonaparte from Elba in 1815 the princes of the house of Bourbon were obliged to withdraw. It was also the scene of dreadful riots in the latter part of 1831. This city is seated at the conflux of the Saone with the Rhone, 15 m. N. of Vienne, and 280 S. E. of Paris. Long. 4. 49. E., lat. 45. 46. N. Pop. 145,675.

Madagascar, an island lying on the eastern coast of Africa, about 800 m. in length, 300 in breadth, and 2,000 in circumference. It is intersected throughout its whole length by a chain of lofty mountains, the scenery of which is in many places strikingly grand and picturesque. The climate is healthy and the soil extremely fertile; its products are rice, sugar, silk and potatoes. The cocoa-nut, the banana, and other useful trees, flourish here. The island rears no horses, or camels, but large herds of oxen, some of which come to an enormous size. The great bat whose flesh is very delicate, is also found here. The inhabitants are divided into a number of tribes, and amount to more than 4,000,000. The natives, called Madagasses, are commonly tall and well made, of an olive complexion, which in some is pretty dark. Their hair is usually long and black, curling naturally; their noses are small, though not flat. They seem to have had a great many Arabs among them, with whom they are mixed; and there are some of a yellowish complexion, who have neater features than the rest. Although a populous country, here are no cities or towns, but a great number of villages at a small distance from each other, composed of huts, with doors so low that a boy of 12 years old cannot enter them without stooping. They have neither windows nor chimneys, and the roofs are covered with reeds or leaves. Both men and women are fond of bracelets and necklaces, and anoint their bodies with grease or oil. Those that are dressed in the best manner have a piece of cotton cloth, or silk, wrapped round their middle; but they generally make little use of clothing. Their beds are only mats spread upon boards; and a piece of wood or stone serves them for a bolster. They are very superstitious, and practise circumcision and polygamy. Madagascar is happily exempt from the ravages of the lion and the tiger, but here are great numbers of locusts, which some times swarm to such a degree as to darken the air.

They are eaten by the natives, and considered as a dainty food. Here are also crocodiles, and cameleons. The French have frequently attempted to settle here, but have always been driven away; and there are only some parts on the coast yet known. The chief settlement was at Port Dauphin, on the S. E. coast, in long. 47. 0. E., lat. 25. 0. S., and the place most visited by the Europeans is more to the N., called Foulepointe, long. 49. 50. E., lat. 17. 40. S.

Madawaska river, one of the head streams of the St. John, in the northern part of the State of Maine. Its whole course lies within the territory which has lately been the subject of dispute between the American and British governments; and according to the recent decision of the king of the Netherlands it belongs to the British. At the junction of this stream with the St. John's are several French settlements established by refugees from Nova Scotia in the early part of the last century. The inhabitants amount to about 2,000.

Madalena, or Magdalena, a river of Terra Firma, which rises in the mountains to the E. of Popayan, takes a northerly course of above 600 m. and enters the Carribean Sea, by several mouths, between Carthagena and St. Martha.

Madbury, a township of Strafford Co. N. H. 11 m. N. W. Portsmouth, Pop. 510.

Madeira, an island in the Atlantic Ocean, 54 m. long and 20 broad, and 250 N. by E. of Teneriffe. The Portuguese discovered this island in 1419; it was uninhabited, and covered with wood, and on that account they called it Madeira. Prince Henry, the next year, settled a colony here, and not only furnished it with the plants and domestic animals common in Europe, but procured slips of the vine from Cyprus, and plants of the sugarcane from Sicily; and the sugar and wine of Madeira quickly became articles of some consequence in the commerce of Portugal. The sugarworks have since been removed, but its wine is now in the highest estimation, especially such as has been a voyage to the E. or W. Indies. The scorching heat of summer and the icy chill of winter are here unknown; for spring and autumn reign continually, and produce flowers and fruits throughout the year. The cedar tree is found in great abundance, and the dragon tree is a native of this island. Flowers nursed in the English green-houses grow wild here in the fields; the hedges are mostly formed of the myrtle, rose, jasmine, and honeysuckle; while the larkspur, Scorodolus, lupin, &c., spring up spontaneously in the meadows. There are few reptiles to be seen in the island; the lizard is the most common. Canary birds and gold-finches are found in the mountains. The hog is the food most relished; they are suffered to range among the mountains, and are hunted and caught by dogs. Salted cod is imported from America, and is the chief diet of the poor. Madeira is well watered and populous. The British factory settled in this island consists of upwards of 20 commercial houses, and have considerably more of its trade than the Portuguese. In 1808 it surrendered to the English, but was afterwards restored. Funchal is the capital.

Madely Market, a town in Shropshire, Eng. It is celebrated for having afforded refuge to Charles I., after the battle of Worcester. Here are some very extensive iron works; and a work for obtaining fossil tar from the smoke of coal. It is 9 m. N. of Bridgenorth, and 147 N. W. of London.

Madhugiri, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore with a strong hill-fort. In its vicinity much iron is smelted, and a great number of cattle are bred. It is seated amid hills and fertile valleys, 22 m. E. of Sera.

Madian, or Midian, a town of Arabia Petrea, on the E. side of the eastern arm of the Red Sea. The Arabians call it Megar el Schuoi, the Grotto of Schuaid (or Jethro), and suppose it to be the place where Moses tended the flocks of his father-in-law. It is 50 m. N. of Moilah, and 80 S. of Acaba.

Madras, or Fort St. George, a celebrated fort and city of Hindoostan. It is the capital of the British possessions on the E. side of the peninsula, and is a fortress of very great extent. It is close on the margin of the Bay of Bengal, from which it has a rich and beautiful appearance, the houses being covered with a stucco called chunam, which in itself is nearly as compact as the finest marble, and bears as high a polish. The Black Town is separated from the fort by an esplanade. In common with all the European settlements on this coast, Madras has no port for shipping, the coast forming nearly a straight line; and it is incommoded also with a high and dangerous surf. It is the seat of an archdeaconry, and of missions from different societies in Britain. In 1746 it was taken by the French, but restored by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. It is 100 m. N. by E. of Pondicherry. Long. 80. 25. E., lat. 13. 5. N.

Madras Territory, the countries subject to the presidency of Fort St. George, or Madras, comprehending nearly the whole of India, S. of the river Kistnah, and the extensive province denominated the Northern Circars. Within these boundaries, however, three native princes, the rajahs of Mysore, Travancore, and Cochin, still collect their resources, and exercise a certain degree of authority within their territories. The rest of the country is under the immediate jurisdiction of the governor and council of Madras; and is subdivided into 24 districts, over each of which there is a European judge and a collector, with the requisite establishments. There are also four provisional courts of circuit and appeal, to which the above mentioned judges are subordinate, and a supreme court of appeal stationary at Madras, consisting of four judges, selected from the company's civil servants.

Madre de Dios, an island in the Pacific Ocean, near the coast of Patagonia, 180 m. in circumference.

Madre de Popa, a town of New Granada, with a celebrated convent. It is much resorted to by the pilgrims of S. America, and they pretend that the image of the Virgin has done a great many miracles in favour of the sea-faring people. It is seated on the Madalena, 50 m. E. of Carthagena.

Madrid, the capital of Spain, in New Castile. It was formerly an inconsiderable place, belonging to the archbishop of Toledo, but the purity of the air engaged the court to remove hither, and it is now a considerable city. It contains 77 churches, 66 convents, 15 gates of granite, and about 900,000 inhabitants. The houses are mostly built of stone; and the principal streets are long, broad, and straight, and adorned at proper distances with handsome fountains. There are above 100 towers or steeples, in different places, which contribute greatly to the embellishment of the city. It stands in a plain, surrounded by mountains, and has a high wall, built of masonry. There are two palaces on a large scale. The Palacio Real, at the west end, is strongly built and elegantly ornamented on the outside; the Buen Retiro is situated at the east of the town, and is chiefly remarkable for its large collection of paintings, and very extensive gardens. The churches and monasteries contain many paintings, by the most celebrated masters. The squares are numerous; the finest is the Plaza Mayor, which is 1,536 feet in circuit, surrounded by houses, 5 stories high, all of an equal height; every story being adorned with a handsome balcony, and the fronts supported by columns, which form very fine arcades. Here the auto da fe, were formerly celebrated, with all their terrible apparatus. In the environs are several royal residences, such as the Casa del Campo, where a great many wild animals were formerly kept for the chase. The manufactures of Madrid are very inconsiderable; those for hats, and the royal china and salt-petre works, are the principal. The French took possession of the city in March 1808, and on the 2nd of May the inhabitants rose up in arms to expel them from the city, when a terrible carnage took place for several hours, and it was not till the arrival of more troops that order was enforced among the people. On the 20th of July following, Joseph Bonaparte entered it as king of Spain; but was obliged to quit it soon afterwards. On the 2nd of December, of the same year, it was retaken by Napoleon, who reinstated his brother on the throne, and he kept possession till August 1812, when Madrid was entered by the British army, under the duke of Wellington. The French, however, again took possession of it in November; but finally evacuated it the following year. The inhabitants joined in the revolution of 1680, when the king was obliged to accede to the general desire of restoring the constitution of the Cortes of 1812. See Spain. Madrid is on the river Manzanares, over which is a magnificent bridge, 265 m. N. E. of Lisbon, and 650 S. S. W. of Paris. Long. 3. 34. W., lat. 40. 25. N.

Madrid, p.t. St. Lawrence Co. N. Y. on the St. Lawrence. Pop. 3,459.

Madrigal, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, seated in a plain, fertile in excellent wine, 10 m. N. E. of Medina del Campo.

Madrisio, a town of Italy, in Friuli, 30 m. N. of Venice.

Mad River, a town of Clark Co. Ohio, on a stream of that name running into the Great Miami.

Madrogan, a town of Africa, the capital of Mocarang, with a spacious royal palace. The upper part of the houses is in the shape of a bell. Long. 29. 40. E., lat. 10. 0. S.

Madura, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name, belonging to the British, and included in the collectorship of Dindigul.

It is fortified with square towers and parapets, and has one of the most superb pagodas in Hindoostan. It is 130 m. N. N. W. of Cape Comorin, and 270 S. S. W. of Madras. Long. 78. 12. E., lat. 9. 55. N.

Madura, an island in the Indian Ocean, on the N. coast of the island of Java. It is 100 m. long and 15 broad, and the soil is fertile and well cultivated. The chief towns are Samanap, Parmacassan, and Bancallan.

Maeler, a lake of Sweden, 80 m. long and 20 broad, between the provinces of Westmania and Sudermania. It contains several fine islands, is usually frozen during a few weeks in winter, and opens an easy communication, by sledges, between the interior parts of Sweden and the city of Stockholm.

Maelstrom, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Norway, in 68. N. lat. and near the island of Moskoec, whence it is also named Moskoestrom. When it is flood, the stream runs up the country with a boisterous rapidity; but the roar of its impetuous ebb to the sea is scarcely equalled by the loudest cataracts. The whirlpool is of such an extent and depth that, if a ship comes within its attraction, it is inevitably absorbed and beaten in pieces against the rocks below; and when the water relaxes, the fragments come up again. The intervals of tranquility are only at the turn of the ebb and flood, and calm weather; and they last but a quarter of an hour, its violence gradually returning. When the stream is most boisterous, and its fury heightened by a storm, vessels have been reached by it at the distance of 5 m.

Maerna, a town of Germany, in Tyrol, 23 m. W. S. W. of Trent.

Meuse. See Meuse.

Meuseyk, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of Liege, on the river Meuse, 10 m. S. S. W. of Ruremonde.

Maeslandsluys, a town of S. Holland, near the mouth of the Meuse, 10 m. W. of Rotterdam.

Maastricht, a city of the Netherlands, about 4 m. in circumference, seated on the Meuse, opposite Wyck, with which it communicates by a stone bridge. The number of inhabitants is estimated at 18,000. It has fine long streets, many churches and convents, a college formerly belonging to the Jesuits, a council house with its library and considerable manufacture of cloth, leather, hosiery, and hardware. Near it is the lofty mountain of St. Peter, with a fortress; and a stone quarry, with such a number of subterranean passages as to be capable of containing 40,000 persons. The other fortifications and the situation of Maastricht are such that it is deemed one of the strongest places in Europe. The city was besieged by the French in 1748, during the negotiations of Aix-la-Chapelle, was unsuccessfully attacked by them in 1793, and they became masters of it towards the end of the following year. In 1814 it was delivered up to the allied forces. It is 14 m. N. N. E. of Liege, and 58 E. of Brussels. Long. 5. 48. E., lat. 50. 49. N.

Mafta, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, with a college founded in 1772. In a sandy and barren spot near this place John V., in pursuance of a vow, erected a building of extraordinary magnificence, as a Franciscan convent. The town is seated near the sea, 18 m. N. N. W. of Lisbon.

Magadi, or Maghery, a town of Hindoostan, in the district of Mysore, seated in a hilly country, abounding in timber-trees, stone and iron, 24 m. W. of Bangalore.

Magadoza, the capital of a kingdom of the same name, on the coast of Ajan, with a citadel, and a good harbour. It stands at the mouth of a river, which is supposed to have a long course, having regular inundations that fertilize the country to a great extent. The inhabitants are mostly Mahomedans; but there are also some Abyssinian Christians. They all speak the Arabic tongue, are stout and warlike and among other weapons use poisoned arrows and lances. The city is a place of great commerce, receiving from Adel and other parts, cotton, silk spices, and drugs, in exchange for gold, ivory, wax, and other commodities. Long. 46. 25. E., lat. 2. 10. N.

Magdalen Isles, a group of islets, in the gulf of St. Lawrence, near its entrance. They are inhabited by a few families, whose chief support is derived from fishing.

Magdalena, a large river of Colombia, which rises in the province of Popayan, and after a course of 900 m. falls into the sea, in lat. 11. 2. N.

Magdalena, a river of New Mexico, which runs into the sea between the rivers Flores and Mexicano.

Magdeburg, a government of the Prussian states, in Saxony, composed of part of the Old Mark on the left of the Elbe, the principality of Halperstadt, the abbey of Quedlinburg, the county of Wernigerode, the barony of Schauen, and the bailiwicks of Kloetze, Barby, and Gommern. It comprises a superficial area of nearly 4,400 sq. m., is divided into 15 circles, and contains 450,000 inhabitants. The country is in general level, and the parts which are not marshy and overgrown with wood are very fertile. Its commerce is greatly facilitated by the Elbe, which traverses through its whole extent.

Magdeburg, a fortified city, capital of the foregoing government. It has a handsome palace, a citadel with a fine arsenal, and a magnificent cathedral, which contains the superb mausoleum of Otho the great. The inhabitants are computed at 30,000. Here are manufactures of cotton and linen goods, stockings, gloves, porcelain, hats, leather, soap, and tobacco; but the principal are those of woolen and silk. It is well situate for trade, on both sides of the Elbe, by which it has an easy communication with Hamburg. In the neighbourhood are the monastery of Bergin, and the salt-works of Schönebeck, producing about 30,000 tons annually. Magdeburg has sustained several sieges. In 1631 it was taken by the Austrians, who burnt the town, except the cathedral and a few houses, adjacent, and massacred above 10,000 of the inhabitants; but it was soon handsomely rebuilt. In 1806 it surrendered to the French, and was not restored till 1813. It is 75 m. W. S. W. of Berlin, and 120 S. E. of Hamburg. Long. 11. 40. E., lat. 52. 10. N.

Magellan, a strait of S. America, discovered in 1520 by Ferdinando Magellan, a Portuguese in the service of Spain. It has since been sailed through by several navigators; but the passage, upward of 300 m. being dangerous and troublesome, they now sail round Cape Horn.

Magerville, a township of Sunbury Co. New Brunswick, on the St. Johns.

Maggeroe, or Mageron, a large island on the coast of Norway, and the most northern land in Europe. It is separated from the continent on the S. by a narrow channel; and its N. extremity is an enormous rock, called N. Cape. Long. 26. 57. E., lat. 71. 10. N.

Magherafell, a town of Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, with a considerable linen manufacture, 13 m. W. of Antrim, and 30 S. E. of Londonderry.

Magia, a river of Switzerland, in the canton of Tessin, which runs S. with rapidity, through a narrow valley of its name, and enters the lake of Maggiore, near Locarno.

Maggiore, a lake of Upper Italy, separating part of the Austro-Italian government of Milan from the states of Sardinia, and extending from Sesto, northward to Locarno; 30 m. in length, and 3 in breadth. The river Tesino runs S. through its whole length; and it contains the celebrated Borromean Isles.

Magindanao. See Mindanao.

Magliano, a town of Italy, province of Sabina, seated on a mountain, near the river Tiper, 34 m. N. of Rome. Long. 12. 35. E., lat. 42. 25. N.

Magna Macca, a town and fort of Italy, in the Capal states, seated at the mouth of the lake of Commachio, in the gulf of Venice, 3 m. S. E. of Commachio.

Mahoning, three townships in Mercer, Indiana and Columbia Cos. Pa. Also a river of Pennsylvania falling into the Alleghany.

Mahratta Territory, an extensive country of Hindoostan, which till lately stretched across what is called the peninsula of India. On the accession of Ram Rajah, in 1740, the peishwa and the paymaster-general confined him to the fortress of Sattarah, and divided the empire between them, the former fixing his residence at Poonah, which became the capital of the Western Mahrattas; the latter founding a new kingdom in the province of Gundwanah, called the Eastern Mahrattas, and fixing his residence at Nagpore, which see. The peishwa became dependent on the British in 1802, but attempting to shake off his dependence, he was defeated and deposed. The Mahrattas are Hindoos: and many of the Brahmins are polished and insidious merchants. They are fond of horses, and their army was almost entirely composed of cavalry; they were however, never very formidable, as a regular force, depending more on the celerity of their motions and the suddenness of their incursions than on the boldness with which they met their enemies.

Mahrburg. See Marchburg.

Mahur, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of its name, in the province of Berar; seated on the Chin, Gonga, which flows into the Godavery, 140 m. S. W. of Nagpore. Long. 78. 34. E., lat. 19. 24. N.

Maida, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra. On the plain near this place, in 1806, a victory was obtained by the British troops over the French. It is 9 m. W. S. W. of Squillace.

Maiden Creek, a township of Berks Co. Pa.

Maidenhead, a town in Berkshire, Eng. with a good trade in malt, meal, and timber. It is seated on the Thames, over which is a bridge, 12 m. E. by N. of Reading, and 26 W. by N. of London. 2 m. distant is Maidenhead Thicket, formerly infested by highwaymen.

Maidstone, a borough and the county town of Kent, Eng. It has a brisk trade in exporting the commodities of the county, particularly hops, of which there are numerous plantations around, here are likewise paper-mills, and a manufacture of linen. The church is a spacious and handsome edifice; and there are several meeting houses for dissenters, a grammar school, 8 charity schools, &c. Maidstone is seated on the Medway, over which is a bridge of seven arches, 10 m. W. of Canterbury, and 34 E. S. E. of London. Long. 0. 38. E., lat. 51. 16. N.

Maidstone, a township of Essex Co. Vt. 53 m. N. Montpelier. Pop. 236; also a township of Essex Co. U. C.

Maidpore, a town of Hindoostan, in the Malwal, near which the troops of Holkar were defeated by the British in 1817. It is seated on the Soprah, 20 m. N. of Oojain.

Mailcotay, a lofty fortress of Hindoostan, in Mysore, and one of the most celebrated places of Hindoo worship. The large temple is a square building of great dimensions, and the jewels belonging to it are very valuable. In 1772 Hyder was completely routed by the Mahrattas near this place; and it was here that the Mahratta chiefs joined lord Cornwallis in 1791. It is 17 m. N. of Seringapatam.

Maillezais, a town of France, department of Vendee, seated on an island formed by the Seure and Autize, 22 m. N. E. of Rochelle.

Maina, a sea-port of Greece, in the Morea, which gives name to a district that lies between two bays of the Mediterranean Sea. The inhabitants of the district, estimated at 50,000, could never, even nominally, be subjected to the Turks, till the end of the 18th century, when they agreed to pay a small tribute to the Porte. The town is seated on the bay of Coron, 46 m. S. by W. of Mistrata. Long. 32. 10. E., lat. 36. 34. N.

Maine, one of the United States, and constituting the north-eastern extremity of the Union. It extends from 43. 5. to 47. 20. N. lat. and from 66. 49. to 71. 4. W. long. bounded N. and N. W. by Lower Canada. E. by New Brunswick, S. by the Atlantic, and W. by New Hampshire, and containing 30,000 square m. The northern limit, as fixed by the king of the Netherlands, has somewhat reduced the state from its former dimensions. The northern parts are mountainous, and a part of the north-western limit is formed by one of the extremities of the Apalachian chain. Mount Katahdin or Ktaada an isolated peak in the north is 5,385 feet in height, and several other elevations exceed 4,000. The mountains are covered with wood, and indeed all the northern regions may be considered as one great forest. Here is still to be found the moose, a wild animal which has disappeared from almost every other part of the United States. The trees are principally pine, hemlock, spruce and birch. Toward the sea grow the white and red oak, but these trees are not abundant. The chief rivers in Maine are the Penobscot, Kennebec, Androscoggin, and Saco which rise among the mountains and flow southerly into the Atlantic. These streams have a rapid course and in the upper part are much broken by falls. The Walloostook Aroostook and Allagash, in the north, flows into the St. Johns. The St. Croix forms a part of the eastern boundary. There are many lakes in this state, the largest of which are the Moosehead, Chesuncook, and Schoodic. The coast is indented with a great number of bays and inlets of the sea, and no state in the Union has so many excellent harbours. Along the coast are also scattered many fine islands, a great number of which are populous and well cultivated. The mineral productions are few. Iron and lead in small quantities have been discovered. Slate and limestone are abundant; lime is burnt for exportation at Thomastown and Camden, and all the New England States are supplied from this quarter. The soil among the mountainous parts and on the coast is inferior, but there are many tracts in the interior of great fertility. Wheat, barley, rye and potatoes are extensively cultivated. Maize also receives attention, but does not thrive so well here as in the other New England States. The climate is the coldest in the United States; and in the spring heavy fogs are common. The summer is hot but of short continuance.

The inhabitants subsist mostly by agriculture and maritime enterprize. There are few manufactures in the state except domestic fabrics. The commerce is chiefly confined to the exportation coastwise of lumber, fish, lime, plaster &c. There is also some trade to the West Indies. The shipping in 1827, amounted to 202,396 tons. The imports for 1829, were valued at 742,781; the exports of domestic produce, 729,106 dollars; the total exports 737,832 dollars. The fisheries are very productive; the fish annually taken are estimated to be worth nearly half a million of dollars. The northern parts of the state furnish vast quantities of timber. The trees are felled in the depth of winter by parties which penetrate into the woods in autumn for that purpose, and cut down the trees after the ground is covered with snow sufficiently to enable them to drag the timber by oxen to the rivers where they are rolled upon the ice. When the rivers, break up in the spring the logs are floated down to the sea. Where the rivers are wide and uninterrupted by falls, the logs are fastened together in immense rafts.

This state is divided into 10 counties. The capital is Augusta. The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Representatives, the members of which are chosen annually. The Governor is also elected annually. All the elections are popular, and suffrage is universal. The most numerous religious sect is that of the Baptists; they have 148 ministers; the Calvinistic congregationalists have 107; the Methodists 56; the Unitarians 8; the Episcopalians 4; the Catholics 4. There are also 30 societies of Quakers, 50 of Freewill Baptists; 3 of Sandemanians and some Universalists. There are colleges at Brunswick and Waterville and theological seminaries at Bangor and Readfield. Common schools are supported by law and the business of education receives great attention.

There are some Indians remaining in this state, chiefly of the Pennobscot tribe. Their settlements are on the Penobscot, and on Pasamaquoddy Bay. The population of Maine is 399,462. This state was originally a part of Massachusetts with the title of the District of Maine. In 1820 it was admitted into the Union as an independent State.

The most populous part of the state lies along the coast. The northern part is unsettled. The largest town is Portland; the other principal towns are Bath, Hallowell, Gardiner, Bangor, Wiscasset, Thomastown, Eastport, Lubec and York.

Maine, a large river of Germany, formed by two streams called the Red and White Maine, which rises among the mountains of Franconia. It joins the Rhine a little above Mentz.

Maine, Lower, a circle of the Bavarian states, contiguous to Baden, Hesse-Cassel, and Hesse-Darmstadt, comprising a superficial extent of 3000 sq. m. with 423,000 inhabitants. The principal products are corn and wine. Wartsburg is the capital.

Maine, Upper, a circle of the Bavarian states, 2 x 2 contiguous to Bohemia and Saxony, comprising an extent of 3,460 sq. m. with 434,000 inhabitants. The manufactures, though confined to the productions of the province, viz. the metals, flax, and timber, are considerable. Bayreuth is the capital.

Maine-et-Loire, a department of France, bounded by the departments of Mayenne, Sarthe, and Indre-et-Loire, comprising an extent of 4,000 sq. m. with 404,600 inhabitants. The soil is in general fertile, producing corn, flax, hemp, fruit, and wine; and the manufacture of linen is carried on to a considerable extent. Angers is the capital.

Maine and Tauber, a circle of Baden, comprising the N. E. portion of the grand duchy, and a small tract on the Maine, insulated from the rest by part of Bavaria. Wertheim is the chief town.

Mainland, the principal of the Shetland Isles, is 60 m. long, and from 6 to 18 broad, and is divided into eight parochial districts. The face of the country exhibits a prospect of black, craggy mountains, and marshy plains, interspersed with some verdant spots, which appear smooth and fertile. The mountains abound with various kinds of game; the lofty cliffs, impending over the sea, are the haunts of eagles, falcons, and ravens; the deep caverns underneath shelter seals and otters; and to the winding bays resort the swans, geese, scaups, and other aquatic birds. The seas abound with fish, such as the herring, cod, turbot, and haddock; lobsters, oysters, muscles, &c., are also plentiful; while the rivulets and lakes abound with salmon, trout, &c. The hills are covered with sheep of a small breed, and of a shaggy appearance; but their fleeces is very soft, and extremely fine. Their horses are of a diminutive size, but remarkably strong and handsome, and are well known by the name of Shelties. There is an immense store of peat, but no coal. The inhabitants are estimated at about 14,000. They have some manufactures of linen and woolen cloth, but their chief employment is derived from the fisheries. Lerwick is the capital.

Mainland, the principal of the Orkney islands. See Pomona.

Maintenon, a town of France, department of Eure-et-Loire, seated between two mountains on the river Eure, 11 m. N. by E. of Chartres.

Maire, La, a strait of S. America, between Terra del Fuego and Staten Land, about 15 m. long, and as many broad.

Maisa, a town of Hungary, in Little Cumania, with 4,100 inhabitants. 17 m. S. by W. of Felegahaza.

Maizant, St. a town of France, department of Deux Sevres, with a trade in corn, and manufactures of stockings, woolen stuffs, &c. It is seated on the Sevre Niortoise, 36 m. S. W. of Poitiers.

Majombo, a country on the coast of Guinea, between Biafara and Gabon, of which little is known.

Majorca, the principal of the Balearic Isles, 40 m. long and 35 broad, situate in the Mediterranean Sea, between Ivica and Minorca. The whole coast is lined with strong towers. The N. W. part is mountainous; the rest produces good corn, olive-trees, fine honey, and delicate wine. Palma is the capital.

Mayumba. See Mayumba.

Maikarev, a town of Russia, in the government of Niznei Novogorod, situate on the Volga, 24 m. E. N. E. of Niznei Novogorod.

Makariuf, or Makarev, a town of Russia, in the government of Kostroma. It is seated on the river Unza, 140 m. E. of Kostroma. Long. 44. 14. E., lat. 58. 50. N.

Makefield, p.t. Bucks Co. Pa.

Maker, a village in Cornwall, Eng. 7 m. S. E. of St. Germans, on an eminence, forming the W. point of the Hamoaze, at Plymouth. On the heights is a very strong battery; and the steeple of the church, called Maker Tower, it is a noted sea-mark. Long. 4. 10. W., lat. 50. 21. N.

Malabar, a maritime province of Hindoostan, lying between 10. and 13. N. lat., now under the dominion of the British. It consists either of flat land washed by the sea, or of different ranges of hills, extending to the foot of the mountains; and it is intersected by a number of mountain streams. Its chief produce is timber, sandalwood, cocoa-nut, coir, and black pepper. Its principal towns are Calicut, Tellicherry, and Cannanore. The inhabitants are principally Hindoos; but there are also Jews, Mahomedans, and Christians.

Malacca, or Malaya, an extensive country of India, beyond the Ganges, bounded on the N. by Siam, E. by the ocean, and S. W. by the strait of Malacca, which separates it from Sumatra. It is 775 m. in length and 125 in breadth; and produces a great many excellent fruits and roots, pepper, and other spices, with some precious gums and woods. There is but little corn, and sheep and oxen are scarce; but hogs and poultry are plentiful. The Malays are rather below the middle stature; their limbs well shaped; their complexion tawny; their eyes large; and their hair long, black, and shining. They are fond of navigation, war, plunder, emigration, adventures and gallantry; talk incessantly of their honor and bravery, and speak the softest language of Asia; yet they are deemed the most treacherous and ferocious people on the face of the globe. The government is vested in a rajah, or sultan, with a great number of chiefs under him, who generally pay very little regard to his authority. Their religion is a mixture of Mahomedism and paganism. The inland parts are possessed by a savage and barbarous people.

Malacca, the capital of the above country, situate on the western coast. The Portuguese had a factory here, which was taken from them by the Dutch in 1640; it was subjected to the English in 1795; restored to the Dutch in 1818; but is now under the authority of Great Britain, and is one of the principal stations of the London Missionary Society. It is seated on the strait of its name, 480 m. S. E. of Acheen. Long. 102. 5 E., lat. 2. 12. N.

Malaga, a sea-port and city of Spain, in Granada, with a good harbour, capable of containing 400 merchant vessels and 20 sail of the line. The cathedral is a stupendous pile, begun by Philip II. while married to Mary of England, and their united arms are over the gate. The inhabitants are about 50,000, who have some trade in raisins and excellent wines, and manufactures of silks, velvets, soap, paper, &c. Malaga was taken by the French in 1810, and remained in their possession till 1812. It is seated on the Mediterranean, surrounded by hills, 55 m. W. S. W., of Granada. Long. 4. 10. W., lat. 36. 35. N.

Malahide, a town and bay of Ireland, in the county of Dublin, 6 m. from the capital. In the vicinity is Malahide Castle, the residence of the Talbot family.

Malambito, a town of S. America, in the province of Carthage, about 60 m. E. of Carthage, on the W. side of the river Magdalena.

Malamocco, a small island and town of Austrian Italy, 5 m. S. of Venice.

Malatia, a town of Asia Minor, on the site of the ancient Melitene, once the capital of Armenia Minor; seated 15 m. W. of the Euphrates, 90 W. N. W. of Diarbekir. Long. 57. 30. E. lat. 37. 30. N.

Malavully, or Malavilly, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a large mud fort, separated into two parts by a transverse wall. Here is a fruit-garden of great extent, planted by the late sultans. Tipoo Sultan was defeated here by general Harris in 1799. It is 35 m. E. of Seringapatam.

Malchin, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, seated on the river Peene, where it forms the lake Camrow, 22 m. E. of Gustrow.

Malcho, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, between the lakes Calpin and Plan, 23 m. S. S. E. of Gustrow.

Maldegheina, a town of France, department of Lys, 10 m. E. of Bruges.

Malda, a town of Bengal, capital of a district of the same name, on the N. E. side of the Ganges. It is the residence of the commercial agent of the E. India Company, and carries on an extensive trade in raw silk, and manufactured goods. Long. 88. 4. E., lat. 25. 3. N.

Malden, a borough in Essex, Eng. with considerable trade, chiefly in corn, salt, coal, iron, deals, and wine. It has two parish churches, a free school, a library, and a town-hall. Vessels of moderate burden come up to the town, but large ships are obliged to unload at a distance below, in Blackwater Bay. The custom of Borough English, by which the youngest son succeeds to the burghage tenure, is kept up here. It is seated on an eminence, on the river Blackwater, 8 m. E. of Chelmsford, and 37 N. E. of London.

Malden, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 5 m. N. E. Boston. Pop. 2,010. Also a town and fort on Detroit river, U. C.

Maldiveas, a cluster of small islands, in the Indian Ocean, lying S. W. of Cape Comorin, extending from the equinoctial line to 8. N. lat., and situated between 72. and 74. E. long. They are divided into 17 attolons, or provinces, each having its separate governor and its distinct branch of industry, the brewers residing in one, the goldsmiths in another, &c. The inhabitants appear to be a mixture of Arabs and Hindoos from Malabar. They supply ships with sails and cordage, cocoa-nuts, oil, and honey, dry fish, tortoise-shell, and especially cowries.

Maldonado, a town of Buenos Ayres, with a harbour sheltered by a small island of its name; seated near the N. entrance of the Plata. Long. 55. 36. W., lat. 34. 50. S.

Maldonado, a small river of Buenos Ayres, which enters the sea in the bay of Maldonado.

Malembe, a sea-port on the coast of Loango, Western Africa. 50 m. S. of Loango.

Malestroit, a town of France, department of Morbihan, seated on the Ouse, 19 m. E. N. E. of Vannes.

Malham, a village in W. Yorkshire, Eng. surrounded on every side by mountains and rising grounds, which abound in natural curiosities: and among them, on a high moor, is a circular lake, about a m. in diameter, which is the source of the river Aire. 6 m. E. of Settle. 233 from London.

Malines. See Mecklin.

Malinagonga, a river of Ceylon, which rises among the hills to the S. E. of Candy, nearly encompasses that city, and, after many windings among the mountains, enters the sea at Trincomalee.

Malleville, a town of France, department of Aveyron, 6 m. N. E. of Villefranche.

Mallicollo, one of the largest of the New Hebrides, in the S. Pacific, extending 90 leagues from N. W. to S. E. The inland mountains are very high, and clad with forests; but the soil is rich and fertile, producing cocoa-nuts, bread fruit, bananas, sugar canes, yams, eddoes, turmeric, oranges, &c. Hogs and common poultry are the domestic animals. The inhabitants appear to be a different race from those of the Friendly and Society Islands. In many particulars they seem to correspond with the natives of New Guinea, particularly in their black colour and woolly hair. They go almost naked, are of a slender make, have lively but very irregular features, and tie a rope fast round their belly. At the S. end of the island is a port, named Sandwich Harbour. Long. 167. 53. E., lat. 16. 25. S.

Malling, West, a town in Kent, Eng. 6 m. W. of Maidstone, and 29 E. by S. of London.

Mallow, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Cork, with considerable linen manufactures and a fine spring of tepid water. It is seated on the Blackwater, 17 m. N. by W. of Cork.

Malmoe, a sea-port of Sweden, government of Malmöhus, with a large harbour and a strong citadel. It has manufactures of woolen, and a considerable trade; seated on the Sound, 18 m. E. by S. of Copenhagen. Long. 13. 7. E., lat. 55. 36

Malmöhus, a government of Sweden, including a great part of the ancient Schonen or Scania. It lies along the Sound and the Baltic, and comprises an area of 1,380 square m. with 137,000 inhabitants.

Malmesbury, a borough in Wiltshire Eng. with a woolen manufacture. Its castle is demolished but there are some remains of its once celebrated abbey. It is seated on a hill, almost surrounded by the Avon, over which it has 6 bridges, 26 m. E. by N. of Bristol, and 96 W. of London.

Malone, p.t. Franklin Co. N. Y. 50 m. N. W. Plattsburg. Pop. 2,907.

Malé, St., a sea-port of France, department of Ille-et-Vilaine, with a strong castle. It has a large harbour, difficult of access, on account of the rocks that surround it, and is a trading place of great importance. It was bombarded by the English in 1693, but without success. In 1758, they landed in Canceille Bay, went to the harbour by land, and burnt above 100 ships. St. Malo is seated on an island, united to the mainland, by a causeway, 44 m. N. N. W. of Rennes. Long. 2. 2. W., lat. 48. 39. N.

Malpas, a town in Cheshire, Eng. It has a handsome church, an independent chapel, an hospital, a grammar school, and a national school; and is seated on a hill, near the river Dee, 15 m. S. E. of Chester, and 165 N. W. of London.

Malplaquet, a village of France, department of the North, famous for a victory gained over the French by the duke of Marlborough, in 1709, 9 m. S. E. of Mons.

Malta, an island in the Mediterranean, between Africa and Sicily, 20 m. long and 12 broad, formerly reckoned a part of Africa, but now belonging to Europe. It was anciently little else than a barren rock, but is now become a fertile island. The principal objects of cultivation are lemons, indigo, saffron, cotton, and vines which produce excellent wine. The number of inhabitants is said to be about 90,000, who speak Arabic and Italian. After the taking of Rhodes, the emperor Charles V., gave this island to the grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. It was attacked in 1566 by the Turks, who were obliged to abandon the enterprise with the loss of 30,000 men. It was taken by Bonaparte in the outset of his expedition to Egypt on the 12th of June, 1798, when he found in it 1,200 canons, 200,000 lbs. of powder, two ships of the line, a frigate, four galleys, and 40,000 muskets; besides an immense treasure collected by superstition; and 4,500 Turkish prisoners, whom he set at liberty. It was soon afterwards taken by the British; was stipulated to be restored to the knights at the peace of Amiens, but retained in consequence of pretended dangers from France. In 1803 the war commenced between the two nations, and the treaty of Paris, in 1814, confirmed the possession of it to Great Britain. Malta is extremely well fortified; the ditches, of a vast size, are all cut out of the solid rock, and extend many miles. Valetta is the capital.

Malta, a township of Kennebec Co. Me. 8 m. E. Augusta, p.t. Saratoga Co. N. Y. 7 m. W. Saratoga. Pop. 1,517.

Malton, New, a borough in N. Yorkshire, Eng. with a considerable trade in coals, corn, butter, &c. Here are two churches, four dissenting meeting houses, a free school, and a national school. It is seated on the Derwent, over which is a stone bridge to the village of Old Malton, 18 m. N. E. of York, and 214 N. by W. of London.

Malvern, Great and Little, two villages in Worcestershire, Eng. The former is 8 m. W. by S. of Worcester, and had once an abbey, of which nothing remains but the gateway of the abbey and the nave of the church, now parochial; the latter is seated in a cavity of the Malvern hills, 3 m. from Great Malvern. Between Great and Little Malvern are two celebrated chalybeate springs, one of which is called the Holy Well.

Malvern Hills, a range of hills in the counties of Worcester and Hereford, Eng. extending about 9 m. in length and from 1 to 2 in breadth. They appear to be of limestone and quartz, and the highest point is 1,313 feet above the surface of the Severn.

Malsah, a province of Hindoostan, bounded N. by the provinces of Agimere and Agra, E. by Allahabad and Gundwannah, S. by Khandaish and Berar, and W. by Agimere and Guzerat. It is 250 m. in length by 150 in breadth, and is one of the most extensive elevated, and diversified tracts in Hindoostan. Till lately the whole territory belonged to the Mahrattas.

Malsieu, a town of France, department of Lozère; seated on the Truyere, 12 m. N. N. E. of Mende.

Manars, a town of France, department of Sarthe, seated on the Dive, 14 m. W. of Bellesme.

Man, an island in the Irish Sea, 30 m. long and 12 broad. It contains 18 parishes under the jurisdiction of a bishop, called the bishop of Sodor and Man, who is sole baron of the isle, and possesses other important privileges, but has no seat in the British parliament. The air is healthy, and the soil produces more corn than is sufficient to maintain the inhabitants, who are a mixture of English, Scotch, and Irish. The commodities of the island are wool, hides, butter, tallow, black marble, slate, limestone, lead, and iron. Some manufactures of coarse hats, cotton goods, and linen cloth, are carried on in different parts; but its principal trade arises from the herring fishery. The duke of Athol was formerly lord of this island, the sovereignty of which he sold, in 1765, to the crown. The chief towns are Castletown, Douglas, Peele, Ruthin, and Ramsay. It is 18 m. S. of Scotland, 40 m. N. of Wales, 30 W. of England, and 26 E. of Ireland.

Manaar, a small island in the Indian Ocean, on the N. W. side of Ceylon. From this island a bank of sand, called Adam's Bridge, runs over to the continent of Hindoostan, which can be passed only by boats. The sea to the S. of this, between the continent and the island of Ceylon, is called the gulf of Manaar.—The Portuguese obtained possession of the island in 1560; but it was taken by the Dutch in 1658, and in 1795 by the English. Long. 79. 3. E., lat. 9. 6. N.

Nanachia, or Magnisia the ancient Magnesia, a town of Asia Minor, formerly the capital of the Greek empire, seated at the foot of a mountain, on the river Sarabat, 20 m. N. E. of Smyrna. Long. 27. 6. E., lat. 38 45. N.

Manasquan, p.v. Monmouth Co. N. J. 50 m. N. E. Philadelphia.

Manabong, a town of Eastern Africa, situate on the sea-coast, 60 m. S. of Sofala. Long. 35. 39 E., lat. 21. 15. S.

Manchester, a village in Warwickshire, Eng. near Atherstone. It was a Roman station, and here several coins have been dug up: seated on an eminence near the Anker, 106 m. from London.

Mancha, a territory of Spain, lying S. of Old Castile, and N. of Andalusia. It is divided into Upper and Lower, and is nearly surrounded by mountains, producing antimony, vermilion, and mercury. The country is an immense plain, intersected by ridges of low hills and rocks; but it is well cultivated, and produces corn, olives, and wine. The inhabitants are affable, and great lovers of music and dancing; and it was here that Cervantes made his hero, Don Quixote, perform his chief exploits.

Manche, a department of France, including the W. part of Normandy, and comprising about 2,500 sq. m., with 600,000 inhabitants. It is almost surrounded by the English Channel. St. Lo is the capital, but Cherbourg the largest town.

Manchester, a large town in Lancashire, Eng. seated between the rivers Irk and Irwell. It is a place of great antiquity, and has attained greater opulence than almost any of the trading towns in England, but is neither a corporation nor a borough. It has long been noted for various branches of the linen, silk, and cotton manufactures, and is now principally conspicuous as the centre of the cotton trade. The labours of a very populous neighbourhood are collected at Manchester, whence they are sent to London, Liverpool, Hull, &c. These consist of a great variety of cotton and mixed goods, fitted for all sorts of markets, both at home and abroad, spreading over a great part of Europe, America, and the coast of Guinea. Manufactures of tapes and other small wares, of silk goods, and of hats, are also carried on at Manchester. Its chief ornaments are the college, the exchange, the collegiate church, another large church, and a spacious market-place. The churches and chapels of the establishment, several of which are recent erections, are 19 in number. Here are also upwards of 40 places of worship for different sects of dissenters and three for Roman Catholics; one of the latter, opened in 1820, is a beautiful edifice, erected at a cost of £10,000. The charity schools and Sunday schools are numerous. The most important of the other charitable institutions are the Manchester General Infirmary and Dispensary—The Lunatic Asylum—the Fever Hospital—the Lying-in Hospital—the Strangers' Friend Society—the Samaritan Society—the Lock Hospital—the female Penitentiary, and the School for Deaf and Dumb, instituted in 1825. Of the institutions for the promotion of literature and science, the principal are—the Literary and Philosophical Society—the Society for the Promotion of Natural History, and the Royal Manchester Institution. The Mechanics' Institute is in a very flourishing state; and there are several valuable libraries, particularly the College Library and the Portico. Manchester is governed by a borough-reeve, two constables, a deputy constable, &c., and contains several courts of law. It has risen to its present consequence entirely by its manufactures. In respect to population it ranks next to London: in 1821 it contained 133,788 inhabitants. By the Irwell it has a communication with the Mersey and all the late various extensions of inland navigation. It is 36 m. E. by N. of Liverpool, and 186 N. N. W. of London. Long. 2 10. W., lat. 53. 27. N.

Mandal, a town of Norway, capital of a province in the government of Bergen; seated near the mouth of a river of the same name, 60 m. W. S. W. of Christiansand. Long. 7. 42. E., lat. 58. 2. N.

Mandan, a fort and Indian village of N. America, on the Missouri, where captains Lewis and Clarke had their winter encampment, when on their expedition to the Missouri. Long. 100. 50. W., lat. 47. 20. N.

Mandar, a district of the island of Celebes, on the W. and N. coast, bounded W. by the straits of Macassar, and E. by a tract of desert mountains.

Mandingo, a country in the W. part of Negroland, at the sources of the rivers Niger and Senegal. Not only the inhabitants of this state, but the bulk of the people in many other districts in the western part of Africa, are called Mandingoes, probably from having originally emigrated from this country. They are of a mild, sociable, and obliging disposition: the men are above the middle size, well-shaped, strong, and capable of enduring great labour; the women are good-natured, sprightly, and agreeable. The dress of both sexes is composed of cotton cloth of their own manufacture. Polygamy is common, but the women are not under that restraint which prevails in many other countries. Most of the towns contain a mosque, where public prayers are offered; and a bentang, or coffee-house, where public business is transacted. The private houses are built of mud, with a conical bamboo roof, thatched with grass. The language of the Mandingoes is said to be copious and refined, and is generally understood in all the regions of Western Africa.

Mandshars, or Mandshews, a branch of the Mongul Tartars, whose ancestors conquered China in the thirteenth century, but were expelled by the Chinese in 1368. They inhabit the three provinces of Eastern Tartary, and retain the customs they brought from China.

Manfredonia, a sea-port of Naples, in Capitanata, with a castle and a good harbour. All sorts of vegetables are in abundance, and most of the corn exported from the province is shipped here. It is seated on a gulf of the same name, 30 m. E. N. E. of Lucera. Long. 16. 12. E., lat. 41. 31. N.

Mangalore, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Canara, seated between the two arms of a fine lake of salt water, each of which receives a river from the Ghauts; but the bar at the entrance into this harbour will not admit vessels drawing more than ten feet. It is a place of great trade: the principal exports are rice, betel-nut, black pepper; sandal-wood (from the country above the Ghauts,) cinnamon, and turmeric. Here are the ruins of a fort which Tippoo Sultan ordered to be demolished in 1784. In this town a treaty of peace was signed between Tippoo and the English in 1784: in 1799 it came into the hands of the British, and is now the residence of the judge, collector, &c., of S. Canara. It is 130 m. N. N. W. of Calicut, and 190 S. S. E. of Goa. Long. 75. 4 E., lat. 12. 50. N.

Mangroes, an island in the S. Pacific, 5 leagues in circumference. In the interior parts it rises into small hills, and captain Cook, by whom it was discovered in 1777, represents it as a fine island; but he did not find a landing place. Long. 158. 16. W., lat. 21. 27. S.

Manheim, a town of Baden, and capital of the circle of the Neckar. The streets are spacious, straight, and well paved; the houses are elegant and uniform. The palace is a magnificent structure, with a cabinet of natural curiosities and a gallery of pictures. The inhabitants are computed at 24,000. Manheim was frequently taken and re-taken by the French and Austrians in the late wars; and was finally ceded to Baden in 1802. It is 17 m. N. of Spire, and 43 S. of Frankfort. Long: 8. 31. E., lat. 49. 29. N.

Manheim, p.t. Herkimer Co. N. Y. on the Mohawk. Pop. 1,937. p.t. Lancaster Co. Pa. and townships in York and Schuylkill Cos. Pa.

Manica, an inland kingdom in the S. E. part of Africa, bounded on the N. by Mocaranga, E. by Sofala and Sabia, and S. and W. by unknown regions. It is said to abound with mines of gold, and has a river and capital of the same name; but it is little known to Europeans.

Manickdurg, a town and fortress of Hindoostan, in the province of Berar, 5 m. S. E. of Chanada.

Manickpatam, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Orissa, 12 m. S. W. of Juggernaut.

Manickpore, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name in the province of Allahabad; seated on the Ganges, in lat. 19. 40. N., long. 85. 36. E.

Manlius, p.t. Onondaga, Co. N. Y. Pop. 7,375.

Manilla, the capital of the island of Luconia, as well as of the other Philippine islands, and the see of an archbishop, who is commonly the Spanish viceroy. It is well fortified, and defended by the castle of St. Philip. The number of Christian inhabitants is estimated at 12,000. Most of the public structures are built of wood, on account of the frequent earthquakes, by one of which, in 1617, a mountain was levelled, and in 1625 a third part of the city was overthrown by another, when 3,000 persons perished. This city is seated near the lake Bahia, on the E. side of a bay, on the S. W. coast. The bay is a circular basin, 10 leagues in diameter, and great part of it land locked, but the part peculiar to the city, called Cavete, lies 9 m. to the S. W. On account of the pure and mild temperature of the air, it is deemed the most healthy of all the European settlements in the East. Long. 120. 52. E., lat. 14. 36. N.

Manningtree, a town in Essex, Eng. The principal imports are deals, corn, coal, and iron. It is seated on a branch of the Stour, called Manningtree-water, 11 m. W. of Harwich, and 60 E. N. E. of London.

Mannhartstberg, a mountain chain of Austria, beginning at the frontier of Moravia, and terminating at the Danube. The products are corn, saffron, and wine. The chief towns are Crems and Kloster-Neuburg.

Manoquee, a town of France, department of Lower Alps, near the Durance, with a castle, 25 m. N. E. of Aix.

Manpurry, a town and fort of Hindoostan, in the district of Doonab, seated on Issah, 54 m. E. of Agra.

Manresa, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, with a castle, and manufactures of silk, hats, gunpowder, &c.; seated at the conflux of the Cardenero with the Lobregat, 20 m. N. W. of Barcelona.

Mans, a town of France, capital of the department of Sarthe, and the see of a bishop. It contains 18,000 inhabitants, and was formerly much more populous. It has excellent poultry, and its wax and stuffs are famous. It is seated on a high hill, near the Sarthe, 20 m. S. of Alencon, and 75 W. by N. of Orleans. Long. 0. 9. E., lat. 48. 0 N.

Manasarovar, a lake of Thibet, from which the southernmost head of the Ganges was long supposed to issue. It is about 115 m. in circumference, and lies about 79. E. long. and 34. N. lat.

Manzfeld, a town of Prussian Saxony, in the government of Merseburg, with a decayed castle on a high rock: seated on the Thalbach, 8 m. N. W. of Eisleben.

Manzfield, a town in Nottinghamshire, Eng. with a trade in corn and malt, and manufactures of lace, hosiery, and cotton spinning. Here are a commodious church, five meeting houses, a grammar school, two charity schools, and 12 almshouses. Coins of several Roman emperors have been dug up near this town, and the relics recently discovered afford indisputable proof that the Romans had a station in the vicinity. It communicates with the Pinxton Canal by a railway 7 m. in length; and is seated on the edge of the forest of Sherwood, 14 m. N. of Nottingham and 138 N. by W. of London.

Mansilla, a town of Spain, province of Leon, 10 m. S. S. E. of Leon.

Mansoora, a town in the kingdom of Fes, seated near the mouth of the Guir, 60 m. W. of Mequinez.

Manasour, a town of Lower Egypt, with a considerable trade in rice and sal ammoniac, built by the Saracens, during the crusades, as a bulwark against the Christians. It is seated on the E. side of the Nile, 24 m. S. S. W. of Damietta and 60 N. of Cairo.

Mataca. See Malaca.

Mantes, a town of France, department of Seine-et-Oise, with a bridge over the Seine, the great arch of which is 120 feet wide. The wines of its vicinity are famous. It is 31 m. N. W. of Paris.

Mantua, a province of Italy, contiguous to the duchies of Parma and Modena, fertile in corn, flax, fruits, and excellent wine. It comprises a superficial extent of 880 square m. with 214,000 inhabitants; but the former duchy of Mantua was of greater extent. It was governed by the Gonzago family, with the title of duke, till Charles IV., taking part with the French in the dispute relating to the succession of Spain, was put under the ban of the empire, and died in 1708. Having no heirs, the house of Austria kept possession till 1800, when the French obtained it, after the battle of Marengo, but the Austrians obtained possession of it again in 1814.

Mantua, a city of Austrian Italy, capital of the above province. It is seated on an island in the middle of a lake, 20 m. in circumference and two broad, formed by the Mincio; and so very strong by situation, as well as by art, that it is one of the most considerable fortresses in Europe. The only way into this city is by means of two moles or bridges, each of which is defended by a fort and other works. The city is well built, and most of the streets are spacious, regular, and well paved. In the cathedral are paintings by the most celebrated masters; the church of St. Anthony is famous for relics; and the Franciscan church is one of the most elegant of that order in Italy. Here are many other churches, numerous convents, a synagogue for the Jews, who live in a distinct quarter, a university, the ancient ducal palace, with its gallery of paintings, &c. Virgil was born at a village near this city. Mantua surrendered to the French in 1797 (after a siege of eight months), was taken by the Austrian and Russian army in 1799, again ceded to France in 1801, and finally delivered up to the Austrians in 1814. It is 35 m. N. E. of Parma and 70 E. S. E. of Milan. Long. 10 50. E., lat. 45. 10. N.

Mantua, a village in Blockley township adjoining Philadelphia.

Mantua, p.t. Portage Co. Ohio, on the Cuyahoga, 148 m. N. E. Columbus. Pop. 949.

Maoua, one of the Navigator's Islands, in the S. Pacific. Here, in 1787, La Perouse met with his first fatal accident; captain Langle, Lemanon the naturalist, and 9 sailors being massacred by the natives. Long. 169. 0. W., lat. 14. 19. S.

Maracaibo, a province of S. America now forming part of the Venezuelan province of the Colombian republic, and extending N. to the Carribean Sea. The soil is in many places exceedingly fertile, and the climate, although excessively hot, is not on the whole unhealthy. The inhabitants are estimated at about 100,000.

Maracaibo, the capital of the above province, with a harbour which can only admit small vessels, owing to the obstruction of a sand bar. It has a mean appearance, some of the houses being covered with tiles, others with reeds. The climate is hot, and the storms of thunder and lightning that frequently occur are accompanied with tremendous rains. It is seated on the outlet of the lake of its name, 60 m. W. S. W. of Caracas. Long. 71. 46. W., lat. 10. 30. N.

Maracaibo, a lake of Caracas in the province of Venezuela. It is 150 m. long and 90 where broadest, with a circumference of 450; and is navigable for vessels of the greatest burden. The banks are sterile, and the air insalubrious; but the water is fresh, except in stormy weather, when the waters of the sea are forced into it. It communicates with the gulf of Venezuela, by a strait which is defended by strong forts, and has several Spanish towns seated on its borders.

Marseilles, a flourishing sea-port of France, capital of the department of Mouths of the Rhone. The inhabitants are computed at 110,000. It was so celebrated in the time of the Romans that Cicero styled it the Athens of the Gauls, and Pliny called it the Mistress of Education. It is divided into the Old Town and the New. The former appears like an amphitheatre to the vessels which enter the port; but the houses are mean, and the streets dirty, narrow, and steep. In this part is the principal church, built by the Goths, on the ruins of the temple of Diana. The New Town is in every respect, a perfect contrast to the Old, with which it has a communication by one of the finest streets imaginable. The other streets and squarer as well as the public buildings in general are very elegant. With respect to commerce, Marseilles has long been eminent; and it is now sometimes called Europe in Miniature, on account of the variety of dresses and languages. In the environs are nearly 5,000 little country boxes of the citizens, called Bastides. The port is a basin of an oval form, 3,480 feet long, by 960 broad at its widest part, with 18 or 20 feet depth of water. In 1649 the plague raged with great violence in Marseilles, and with still greater in 1720, when it carried off 50,000 of the inhabitants. The late lord Gardenstone observes that Marseilles was a little republic within itself, that the citizens elected their own magistrates, and that the expense of a law-suit never exceeded two pence-halfpenny, which sum was lodged by each party with the clerks of court, at the commencement of every process; after which no further expense was incurred. Marseilles is seated on the Mediterranean, 15 m. S. of Aix, and 450 S. by E. of Paris. Long. 5. 27. E., lat. 43. 18. N.

Mars, a town of Persia, in Khorasan, celebrated for its salt works; situate on the Morga, 130 m. E. N. E. of Mesched.

Marsao, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, 8 m. N. E. of Portalegre.

Marvejols, a town of France, department of Lozere, seated on the Colange, 10 m. N. W. of Mende.

Marsville, a town of France, department of Meuse, seated on the Oshein, 3 m. N. of Jametz.

Mary, St., a sea-port of the state of Georgia, in Camden county, at the mouth of St. Mary River, 70 m. S. by W. of Newport. Long. 81. 52. W., lat. 30. 43. N.

Mary River, St., a river of the state of Georgia, navigable for vessels of considerable burden for 90 m. Its banks afford immense quantities of fine timber suited to the W. India markets. It rises in the Okefonoko Swamp, and thence forms the boundary between Georgia and Florida to the ocean, which it enters at the town of St. Mary, between the points of Amilla and Cumberland islands.

Mary, Strait, St., a strait in N. America, about 70 m. long, which connects Lake Superior and Lake Huron. It contains a number of islands, and at the upper end is a rapid, which, by careful pilots, can be descended without danger.

Maryborough, a town of Ireland, in Queen's county, with considerable woollen manufactures.

It is the shire and assize town, and has an excellent gaol and a market-house. 17 m. S. of Philpottown and 43 S. W. of Dublin.

Maryland, one of the United States, bounded N. by Pennsylvania, E. by Delaware and the ocean; S. and W. by Virginia; extending from 38. to 39. 88. N. lat. and from 75. 10. to 75. 20. W. long. and containing 10,800 sq. m. It embosoms all the northern part of Chesapeake Bay, and is washed on the south-western limit by the Potomac; the other streams are the Patuxent, Patapasco, Severn, Choptank, and Nanticoke. A very narrow strip of its territory extends westwardly and is crossed by the eastern ranges of the Apalachian mountains; but nearly the whole of the state is level and low. In the west the soil is somewhat strong, and in other parts are tracts of thin unproductive soil, but in general the land is excellently fitted for the culture of grain and tobacco. The climate in the southern and eastern parts is unhealthy; agues and intermittent fevers are prevalent in this quarter in summer. The mineral productions are not numerous; bog iron is afforded in many of the level tracts in the south, and coal occurs in various quarters; neither of these, however, are extensively worked. Agriculture is chiefly confined to the staple articles of wheat and tobacco; cotton has lately been introduced, and promises well; flax and hemp are also raised in the west. The manufactures consist of cotton, paper, iron, glass, carpeting, &c. and there are great numbers of flour mills in the state, particularly in the neighbourhood of Baltimore. Commerce is very active; the state is admirably situated for maritime trade, being intersected by the noble bay of Chesapeake and many navigable rivers. The shipping in 1828 amounted to 170,967 tons, but a great proportion of the commerce is carried on by northern vessels. The imports for the same year were estimated at 4,804,135 dollars; the exports of domestic produce 3,662,273 dollars, total exports 4,804,465 dollars.

Maryland consists of two divisions, separated by the Chesapeake, called the Eastern and Western shores. The counties are 19. The population is 446,913, of whom 102,878 are slaves. Annapolis is the seat of government. Baltimore is much the largest city. The other principal towns are Fredrickstown and Hagerstown. The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Delegates. The senators are chosen for 5 years and the Delegates for one. The governor is chosen by the legislature annually. Suffrage is universal. The senators are chosen by electors, who are chosen by the people. Other elections are popular.

The most numerous sect are the Catholics who have an archbishop, the metropolitan of all the Catholics in the United States. They have in this state between 30 and 40 churches. The Episcopalians have 57 ministers; the Presbyterians 17; the Baptist 12; the German Reformed 9. Maryland has a university at Baltimore; at which place there is a Catholic college, and another at Emmittsburg. There is also a college at Annapolis.

The means of internal communications have been greatly increased by artificial improvements. The Potomac and Ohio canal commences in the western part of the state, and extends north-westwardly through this state and Virginia. The Port Deposit Canal passes along the Susquehanna to avoid the obstructions in that river. The Chesapeake and Delaware canal opens a ready communication between these two bays, and rail-reads extend from Baltimore toward the Ohio and Susquehanna.

This state was settled in 1663 by catholics who fled from persecution in England. The present constitution was formed in 1776.

Maryport, a town in Cumberland, Eng. with a good harbour. In 1750 it was only a poor fishing town; but it has now upwards of 5,000 inhabitants who employ upwards of 130 vessels, from 50 to 250 tons burden, in the coal or coasting trade. Here are three ship-yards, and some manufactures; and near the town is the Roman station, Virosidum, where several altars and statues have been dug up. Besides the parish church, here are 5 meeting houses, and a national school. Maryport is situate at the mouth of the Ellen, in the Irish Sea, 28 m. S. W. of Carlisle and 312 N. N. W. of London. Long. 3. 22. W., lat. 54. 35. N.

Masafuero, an island in the Pacific Ocean, 80 m. W. of Juan Fernandez. It is high and mountainous but lowest to the N., and at a distance appears like a hill or rock. It is uninhabited, except by numerous seals and goats. There is also plenty of wood, but difficult to be got off; the heavy surf allows of no good landing place. Long. 81. 40. W., lat. 33. 40. N.

Masbate, one of the Philippines, about 80 m. in circumference; the natives are tributary to the Spaniards. Long. 123. 25. E., lat. 12. 18. N.

Masbrough, a village in W. Yorkshire, Eng. on the river Don, adjoining the bridge of Rotherham. Here are considerable iron works, where all sorts of hammered and cast-iron goods are made.

Mascara, the western province of Algiers, 370 m. long and 130 broad. It is dry, barren, and mountainous, except on the N. where there are plains abounding in corn, fruit, and pastures. The S. parts are inhabited by independent wandering tribes, particularly the Angad tribe.

Mascara, the capital of the above province, with a strong castle, in which the bey resides. In 1732 it was an inconsiderable place; but is now populous and flourishing. It is not so large as Tremesan, but surpasses it in beauty, having a great number of good houses and mosques. It is seated in a fertile district, 45 m. E. S. E. of Oran and 190 S. W. of Algiers. Long. 0. 40. E., lat. 35. 54. N.

Mascat, a sea-port on the E. coast of Arabia, with an excellent harbour. It has a castle on a rock, and is very strong both by nature and art, though the buildings are mean. It was taken, in 1508, by the Portuguese, who retained it for a century and a half. The cathedral, built by the Portuguese, is now the imam's palace. There is no vegetation to be seen on the sea-coast near it, and only a few date trees in a valley at the back of the town, though the inhabitants have all things in plenty. The bazaars are covered with the leaves of date trees, laid on beams which reach from the house tops on one side to those of the other. The inhabitants are Mahomedans. Great Britain recognises the flag of Mascat as neutral, and in time of war it has often been the medium of communication with the enemies' ports. It is seated on a small bay of the Arabian Sea. Long. 59. 26. E., lat. 23. 30. N.

Masham, a town in N. Yorkshire, Eng. with manufactures of coarse woolen cloths; seated on the Ure, 7 m. S. E. of Middleham and 21½ N. N. W. of London.

Mashanagur, a town of Candahar, province of Cabul, situate on the Seward, 48 m. N. of Attock and 130 E. S. E. of Cabul. Long. 71. 7. E., lat. 33. 54. N.

Maskelane Isle, a small beautiful island, in the S. Pacific, lying off the S. E. point of Mallicollo, one of the New Hebrides. Long. 167. 59. E., lat. 16. 32. S.

Masmunster, a town of France, department of Upper Rhine, 25 m. S. S. W. of Colmar.

Masovia, a palatinate of Poland, bounded by Prussian Poland, the palatinates of Sendomir and Kalisch, and Vistula. The name formerly included a province of much greater extent. Warsaw is the capital.

Massa, a town of Italy, capital of the duchy of Massa Carrara which is famous for its quarries of fine marble. The town and its territory belonged to Tuscany, but they are now independent. It is seated on the river Frigido, 3 m. from the sea and 30 N. by W. of Leghorn. Long. 10. 10. E., lat. 44. 2. N. Pop. of the duchy 29,000; of the cap. 7,000.

Massa, a town of Tuscany, in Siennese. Borax and lapis lazuli are found in the neighbourhood. It is seated on a mountain near the sea, 35 m. S. W. of Sienna. Long. 11. 3. E., lat. 43. 5. N.

Massachusetts, one of the New England States bounded N. by N. Hampshire, E. by the ocean, S. by the ocean and the states of Rhode Island and Connecticut, extending from 41. 23. to 43. 52. N. lat. and from 69. 50. to 73. 10. W. long. 190 m. in extreme length from E. to W. and 90 in breadth and containing 7,500 square miles. The Green Mountains extend from Vermont into the western part of this state where they form two ridges called the Hoosac and Tagkanunc Mountains. Farther to the East the White Mountain range enters from New Hampshire and passes southerly to the east of Connecticut river, dividing below Northampton into the Mount Tom, and Lyme ranges. There are no considerable ridges farther east, but several detached eminences are scattered here and there, the most easterly of which is Mount Wachusett in Princeton. The highest point is Saddle Mountain, an eminence of the Tagkanunc ridge in the north-western corner of the state; this is 4,000 feet in height, few of the other peaks exceed 3,000. The rivers of Massachusetts are the Connecticut which intersects the western part, the Merrimack which enters at the north-east and meets the sea in this state, and the Housatonic which rises in the west and passes into Connecticut. The Pawtucket and Taunton which flow into Narraganset Bay, the Charles and Neponset flowing into Boston harbour. The climate exhibits considerable extremes of heat and cold; all the rivers are frozen for 3 months in winter, and the ground is commonly covered with snow during that time.

The spring is wet, foggy and disagreeable; pleasant, settled weather is not generally expected before the middle of May. The summers are hot and vegetation is rapid; the autumn is serene and delightful; winter sets in at the end of November. The climate is salubrious with the exception of its tendency to aggravate pulmonary complaints.

The soil in the interior is generally good, and along the valley of the Connecticut, it is uncommonly rich. The south-eastern part consists of the narrow peninsula of Cape Cod, which projects into the sea in the shape of a man's arm bent inward at the elbow and wrist; it is 75 m. in length and from 5 to 20 in breadth; the soil of this part is almost entirely sand and produces little vegetation except pine shrubs, coarse grass and whortleberry bushes. Agriculture is well understood and skillfully practised in Massachusetts; no state in the Union surpasses it in this respect. The farms are generally from 100 to 200 acres and are almost universally the property of the cultivators; there are many agricultural societies in the state whose exertions to promote skilful and thrifty husbandry have been productive of the best effects. Cattle-shows and exhibitions of the various products of the soil and of household manufacture are also held in many parts of the state. The articles of cultivation are maize, wheat, rye, barley, oats, potatoes, pulse and garden vegetables in great varieties: hay is afforded in great quantities.

In minerals this state is not very productive. Iron is produced in the south; chiefly from bog ore; copper and lead have been found in the interior but they are not at present wrought; marble is abundant in the west, and granite of the best quality abounds at Chelmsford and Quincy. Soap stone and slate are produced in the interior parts, and the island of Martha's Vineyard furnishes argillaceous earth for the manufacture of alum.

The roads in this state are excellent, and the means of internal communication are facilitated by canals. Middlesex canal extends from the Merrimack to Boston harbour: Blackstone canal extends from Worcester to Providence and several canals pass round the obstructions in the Merrimack and Connecticut. The first railroad built in the United States was in this state, and extends from the granite quarries at Quincy to Neponset river. A railroad has also been commenced from Boston to Lowell, and another is projected from Boston to Providence.

In commerce this state is the second in the Union, and in tonnage of shipping, the first. The imports for 1829 were valued at 12,520,744 dollars. The exports of domestic produce at 3,949,751 dollars, total exports 8,254,937 dollars. The shipping in 1828 amounted to 429,513 tons. The fisheries are also very productive, and every sea-port in the state is engaged in them. The cod and mackerel fisheries occupy above 1,000 vessels and the whale fishery 460 ships. The product of the fisheries in 1829 was estimated at 1,070,922 dollars. In manufactures this state has the second rank: the fabrics are cotton, woolen, carpeting, paper, glass, iron, copper, lead, hats, leather, hosiery, lace, duck, chemical preparations, &c. The largest establishments are at Lowell on the Merrimack, 15 m. above Haverhill. This town has been recently founded, and by means of its manufactures has experienced a very rapid growth; a small cotton manufactory was first established here in 1813, and others were added a short time afterwards; at present the place continues to increase and bids fair to equal any of the interior towns in the United States. The manufactures of Lowell are chiefly cotton, of which more than 14,000,000 yards are made annually. Here are also made carpeting, cassimeres, satinets, &c. At Waltham, near Boston, are large manufactures of cotton, principally sheeting and shirting; about 3,000,000 yards are made annually. At Troy are large manufactures of cotton, woolen and iron. At Taunton are manufactures of calico, iron, copper, and lead. At Amesbury are manufactures of flannel, and there are others of woolen and cotton at Southbridge, Milbury, Ware, M. Dudley, Northampton, and a great number of other towns. In many places on the coast are manufactures of salt by solar evaporation. Upon Cape Cod, and in the neighbourhood of New Bedford, more than 600,000 bushels are made yearly.

There are colleges in this state at Cambridge, Williamstown and Amherst, a Theological institution at Andover, and between 50 and 60 incorporated academies in different parts. General education receives the greatest care; common schools are maintained by law in every town. The religious sects are not so numerous as in most other parts of the Union. The Calvinistic Congregationalists have 154 ministers; the Unitarians 140; the Baptists 110; the Methodists 71; the Universalists 46; the Episcopalians 30; and there are one or two other sects. Remnants of some of the Indian tribes still remain in this state; they are about 750 in number and live principally on the island of Martha's Vineyard and on the southerly coast of Cape Cod. They are under the guardianship of the State.

ship of the state government and have missionaries residing among them.

Massachusetts was first settled at Plymouth in December 1620, and this establishment was the germ of all the New England colonies. The state received its name from Massasoit, an Indian Sachem with whom the first settlers made a treaty which was faithfully observed for 50 years. The American revolution began in this state with the battle at Lexington in 1775. The British were driven from Boston the next year, and an independent government was established which preserved the colonial form till 1790. A convention of delegates in that year framed the present constitution, which was slightly revised in 1820.

Massachusetts is divided into 14 counties. The pop. is 610,014. There are 305 towns in the state. The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Representatives, the members of which as well as the Governor and Lieutenant Governor are chosen yearly. Elections are popular, and suffrage is universal. Boston is the capital. The other large towns are Salem, Newburyport, New Bedford, Charlestown, Cambridge, Gloucester, Plymouth, Lynn, Marblehead, Nantucket, Northampton, Springfield, and Haverhill.

Meath, or East Meath, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, 43 m. (English) long and 36 broad; bounded N. by Cavan and Louth, E. by the Irish Sea, S. by Kildare and Dublin, and W. by West Meath. It is divided into 16 baronies and 147 parishes, contains 159,183 inhabitants, and sends two members to parliament. It formerly contained several small bishoprics, which were gradually united into one see, and received the name of Meath in the twelfth century. There is no cathedral, and the episcopal palace is at Ardbraccan, a village near Navan. The agriculture of this county is now in a very flourishing state. The soil in general is a rich fertile loam, producing abundance of corn, and feeding numerous sheep and cattle. Trim is the capital.

Meath, West, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, 49 m. long and 35 broad; bounded N. by Cavan, E. by East Meath, S. by King's county, W. by Roscommon (from which it is separated by the Shannon), and N. W. by Longford. It is divided into 11 baronies (besides half the barony of Fore) and 59 parishes, with parts of seven others, contains about 130,000 inhabitants, and sends three members to parliament. It is very fertile in corn and pasturage, and has several lakes and rivers. This county gives the title of marquis to the family of Nugent. Mullingar is the county town.

Mecca, a city of Arabia, famous as the birth-place of Mahomet. It is seated in a barren valley, surrounded by many little hills, consisting of a blackish rock. The houses follow the windings of the valley, and are built partly on the declivities upon each side. The streets are regular, level, and convenient. The chief support of the inhabitants is derived from the pilgrims, who flock to this place from every part of the Mahometan world. On the top of one of the hills is a cave, where they pretend Mahomet usually retired to perform his devotions; and hither, they affirm, the greatest part of the Koran was brought to him by the angel Gabriel. Numbers of sheep are brought hither to be sold to the pilgrims. The principal ornament of Mecca is the famous temple, which has 42 doors, and its form resembles that of the Royal Exchange in London, but it is nearly ten times as large. The area in the middle is covered with gravel, except in two or three places that lead to the Beat-Allah through certain doors; and these are paved with short stones. The Beat-Allah, in the middle of the temple, is a square structure, covered all over with a thick sort of silk, and the middle embroidered with large letters of gold: the door is covered with silver plates, and has a silver curtain before it, thick with gold embroidery. This Beat is the principal object of the pilgrims' devotion, and is open but two days in the space of six weeks, one day for the men and the next for the women. About 12 paces from the Beat is the pretended sepulchre of Abraham, by whom the Mahometans affirm the Beat-Allah to have been erected; and 2 m. from the town, according to the same authority, is the hill on which he prepared to offer up his son Isaac. The famous balm of Mecca is not manufactured in this city but is found and brought hither from the surrounding country. Mecca is governed by a sheref, who is a temporal prince, and his revenue is increased by the donations of Mahometan sovereigns. It is 34 m. E. N. E. of Jidda, the sea-port of Mecca, and 220 S. by E. of Medina. Long. 40. 55. E. lat. 21. 40. N.

Melville Island, one of a group of islands in the Polar Sea of the western continent, called the Georgian Archipelago, where the English discovery ships under Capt. Parry wintered. It lies between 74. 25, and 75. 50. N. lat. and 106. and 114. W. long. 240 m. long and 100 broad. It is a mass of rocks without a tree or shrub, but in the ravines or valleys the soil affords grass, moss and salads. A few Esquimaux resort hither in summer, and the wild animals of the north also make it their abode in the same season. Herds of musk oxen were seen at Winter Harbour in this island early in the spring. These animals have a singular appearance owing to the shortness of their limbs, their broad, flattened and crooked horns and their long hair which hangs nearly down to the ground. When full grown they weigh about 700 pounds. The flesh of the young cow and calves is tolerably good, but the old ones have so strong a scent of musk that they cannot be eaten. They are found in great numbers within the Arctic Circle, and go in herds of eighty or an hundred.

Memel, a strong town of E. Prussia, with a castle, a fine harbour, and an extensive commerce. It is seated on a river of the same name, at the N. extremity of the Curische Haff; and on the N. At the bottom of a deep ravine, near the village of Berrington, a cavern was discovered, in 1798, containing a great number of human bones, many of them incrustated with a calcareous cement, and a large portion completely incorporated with the solid rock.

Mendelsham, a decayed village and parish in Suffolk, Eng. where an ancient silver crown, weighing 60 ounces, was dug up about the end of the 17th century. It is seated near the source of the Deben, 80 m. N. E. of London.

Mendon, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 37 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 3,152; a township of Monroe Co. N. Y. Pop. 3,076.

Mendoza, a city of Buenos Ayres, province of Cuyo, on the E. side of the Andes, in a plain adorned with gardens, well watered by canals. It contains four convents, a college, and a church. A river of the same name flows by this town, and finally enters the Atlantic under the name of Colorado. Long. 70. 12. W., lat. 34. 0. S.

Mendrah, a province of the kingdom of Ferzan, much of which is a continued level of hard and barren soil; but the quantity of trona, a species of fossil alkali, that floats on the surface, or settles on the banks of its numerous smoking lakes, has given it a higher importance than that of the more fertile districts. It has a town of the same name, 60 m. S. of Mourzouk.

Mendrisio, a town of Switzerland, canton of Ticino, containing several convents. 7 m. W. by N. of Como.

Menehould, St., a town of France, department of Marne. In 1792 the French gave the first check to the progress of the Prussians at this place, which in the end compelled them to a retreat. It is seated in a morass, on the river Aisne, between two rocks, 90 m. E. N. E. of Chalons.

Mengen, a town of Wurtemberg, near the Danube, 60 m. S. of Stuttgart.

Mengeringhausen, a town and castle of Germany, county of Waldeck, 8 m. N. E. of Corbach and 24 N. W. of Cassel.

Menin, a town of the Netherlands, in W. Flanders. It has been often taken; the last time by the French in 1794. It is seated on the Lis, 10 m. N. of Lisle.

Mentona, a town of Nice, with a castle and a small harbour, 5 m. E. N. E. of Monaco.

Mentor, p.t. Geauga Co. Ohio.

Mentz, or Mayence, a city of Germany, in the grand duchy of Hesse, and a bishop's see. It is well fortified, and deemed a barrier fortress. The city is built in an irregular manner, and plentifully provided with churches. The principal buildings are the electoral palace (now much decayed), the house of the Teutonic knights, and the cathedral. Mentz is one of the towns which claim the invention of printing; and the growth of the best Rhenish wine is limited to a circle of about five miles round it. The French took this place by surprise in 1792; and the next year it stood a long blockade and siege before it surrendered to the allies. It was twice re-attacked by the French in 1795, but they were defeated by the Austrians, who also relieved it from a blockade of two months in 1796. The siege was soon after resumed, and continued till the signing of the treaty of Udina in 1797, when the city was taken possession of by the French. By the peace of Luneville, in 1801, it was formally ceded to France, but was delivered up to the allies in 1814. Mentz is seated on the Rhine, just below the influx of the Maine, and on the opposite side is the town of Cassel, connected with it by a bridge of boats. It is 22 m. W. S. W. of Frankfort and 70 E. by N. of Treves. Long. 8. 10. E., lat. 49. 58. N.

Mentz, a township of Cayuga Co. N. Y. 12 m. N. W. Auburn on the Erie Canal. Pop. 4,144.

Menut, a town of Egypt, situate in a well cultivated country, near that branch of the Nile which flows to Rosetta, 40 m. N. N. W. of Cairo.

Menzala, a town of Egypt, situate near a lake of the same name, 60 m. long, separated from the Mediterranean by a narrow slip of land. It is 20 m. S. S. E. of Damietta and 73 N. N. E. of Cairo. Long. 32. 2. E., lat. 31. 3. N.

Meppen, a town of Westphalia, capital of a district of the same name, 52 m. N. of Munster.

Mequinenza, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, with a castle, seated at the conflux of the Segra with the Ebro, 58 m. E. S. E. of Saragossa and 180 E. N. E. of Madrid.

Mequinez, a city of Morocco, seated in a delightful plain, having a serene and clear air; for which reason the emperor frequently resides in this place in preference to Fez. The palace stands on the S. side, and is guarded by several hundreds of black eunuchs, whose knives and scimitars are covered with wrought silver. In the middle of the city, the Jews have a place to themselves, the gates of which are locked every night, and guarded. Close by Mequinez, on the N. W. side, is a large Negro town, which takes up as much ground as the city, but the houses are not so high, nor so well built. The inhabitants of Mequinez, estimated at 112,000, are considered more polished and hospitable than those of the southern provinces. 58 m. W. of Fez. Long. 5. 46. W., lat. 32. 40. N.

Mer, a town of France, department of Loire-et-Cher, 11 m. N. N. W. of Blois.

Meran, a town of the Austrian States, in Tyrol, of which it was formerly the capital; seated near the conflux of the Passar, with the Adige, 12 m. N. N. W. of Botzen. Long. 11. 5. E., lat. 46. 39. N.

Mercer, a county of the W. district of Pennsylvania. Pop. 19,731. The chief town has the same name. A county of Kentucky. Pop. 17,706. Harrodsburg is the capital. A county of Ohio. Pop. 1,110. St. Mary's is the capital. A county of Illinois. Pop. 26.

Mergus, a sea-port on the W. coast of Siam, with an excellent harbour. It was wrested from the Siamese by the Birmans in 1755, but was ceded to Britain in 1824-5, and is 208 m. S. W. of Siam. Long. 96. 9. E., lat. 12. 12. N.

Mergus Archipelago, consists of islands extending 135 m. along the coast of Tannasserim and the isthmus of the Malay peninsula, with a strait between them and the mainland, from 15 to 30 m. broad, having regular soundings and good anchorage. They are in general covered with trees, but are not inhabited, although the soil appears fertile. The principal of them are King's Island, Clara, St. Mathew's and Tannasserim.

Merissa, a strong town of Spain, in Estremadura, built by the Romans, before the birth of Christ. Here are fine remains of antiquity, particularly a triumphal arch. In 1811 it fell into the hands of the French, but was retaken by general (afterwards lord) Hill in the following year. It is seated in an extensive fertile plain, on the river Guadiana, over which is a noble Roman bridge, 32 m. E. of Badajoz. Long. 6. 58. W., lat. 38. 47. N.

Merida, a town of Mexico, capital of a province of the same name, lying between the Bays of Honduras and Campechy. It is situated in an arid plain, 30 m. S. of the gulf of Mexico and 70 N. E. of Campechy. Long. 89. 58. W., lat. 20. 45. N.

Merrimack, a river of New England rising in New Hampshire. One of its head streams called the Pemigewasset has its source near the Notch of the White Mountains; the other flows through Winnipisiogee Lake. The river runs south into Massachusetts, where it turns south-east and flows to the sea at Newburyport. In the upper part of its course it is much obstructed by falls. These afford excellent mill sites, and the largest manufactures in the United States are situated on this river. Many canals pass around the falls; at Chelmsford the Middlesex canal extends from this river to Boston harbour. The mouth of the river is obstructed by a sand bar which does not admit the passage of ships except at high water. There is a good navigation for vessels of 200 tons to Haverhill. Two chain bridges cross the river at Newburyport and Salisbury. The current is rapid and the shores bold; the interval borders are narrower than upon the Connecticut, but afford much beautiful scenery. The waters are pure and salubrious and abound in salmon, shad, alewives, herring and sturgeon, which last gave name to the river, Merrimack being the Indian name for sturgeon. The chief branches are the Contoocook in New Hampshire and Nashua and Concord rivers in Massachusetts.

Merrimack, a county of New Hampshire, formed from the N. part of Hillsborough Co. Pop. 34,619. Concord is the capital.

Merrimack, p.t. Hillsborough Co. N. H. 6 m. E. Amherst. Pop. 1,191. Also townships in Washington and Franklin Cos. Missouri.

Merryhill, p.v. Bertie Co. N. C.

Merrymeeting Bay, a wide expansion of water at the junction of the Kennebec and Androscoggin rivers. Also a bay in Winnipisiogee Lake.

Mersea, a town in Essex Co. U. C. on Lake Erie.

Mersch, a town of the Netherlands, in the duchy of Luxemburg, 8 m. N. of Luxemburg.

Merseburg, one of the new divisions of the Prussian states, consisting principally of cessions made by Saxony in 1815. It lies to the S. of Anhalt and to the E. of the government of Erfurt, and comprises an area of 4,000 sq. m. with 471,000 inhabitants.

Merseburg, the capital of the above government, formerly a bishopric. The most remarkable buildings are the castle, the cathedral which stands below it, and the academy. The brewing and exportation of strong beer furnish the principal employment of the inhabitants. It is seated on the Saale, 15 m. N. W. of Leipzig.

Mersey, a river of England, which rises in the N. extremity of the Peak in Derbyshire, receives the Tame at Stockport, and, lower down, the Irwell; it then passes by Warrington, and receives the Weaver at Frodsham, where it forms a broad estuary, that contracts on its approach to Liverpool, below which it enters the Irish Sea. This river not only affords salmon, but it is visited by annual shoals of smelts, here called sparlings, of a remarkable size and flavor.

Mersey, an island in Essex, Eng. between the mouth of the Coln and the entrance of Blackwater Bay. It has two parishes, called E. and W. Mersey. 7 m. S. of Colchester.

Merthyr Tydfil, a town of S. Wales, in Glamorganshire. It has a canal to Cardiff, immense mines of iron and coal, and very extensive iron works. 3 m. distant are the ruins of Morlais Castle, said to have been the residence of the kings of Brecknock. It is seated on the Taaf, 24 m. N. N. W. of Cardiff and 180 W. of London.

Mertala, a strong town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, seated near the Guadiana, 60 m. S. of Evora and 100 S. E. of Lisbon. Long. 7. 37 W. lat. 37. 41 N.

Merton, a village in Surrey, Eng. with calico manufactures and bleach-fields. Here Henry III. held a parliament in 1236, at which were enacted the Provisions of Merton, the most ancient body of laws after Magna Charta. It is seated on the Mandle, 7 m. S. W. of London.

Merville, a town of France, department of Nord, seated on the Lys, 15 m. N. of Lisle.

Mesched, a city of Persia, capital of Khorassan. It is fortified with several towers; and is famous for the magnificent sepulchre of Iman Risa, of the family of Ali, to which the Persians pay great devotion. Here is a manufacture of beautiful pottery, and another of skins. Caravans are continually passing through this city from Bokharia, Balk, Candahar, Hindoostan, and all parts of Persia. It is 180 m. E. of Asterabad and 490 N. E. of Ispahan. Long. 58. 30. E., lat. 35. 56. N.

Mesched Ali, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Irak-Arabi, near a large lake, called Rahema, which communicates with the Euphrates by a canal. It stands on the spot where Ali, one of the successors of Mahomet, was interred; and his tomb is annually visited by Persian pilgrims. It is 110 m. S. of Bagdad. Long. 44. 50. E., lat. 32. 5. N.

Mesopotamia, the ancient name for the country lying between the Tigris and Euphrates. It now forms a part of Asiatic Turkey.

Mesopotamia, p.t. Trumbull Co. Ohio. 170 m. N. E. Columbus. Pop. 563.

Messa, a considerable town of Morocco, on the river Sus, not far from the Atlantic. It is 165 m. S. W. of Morocco. Long. 10. 46. W., lat. 29. 58. N.

Messina, a sea-port of Sicily, capital of an intendency of the same name, in Val di Demona, with a citadel and several forts. It is 5 m. in circumference, has four large suburbs, and contains 36,000 inhabitants. The public buildings and monasteries are numerous and magnificent; there are 50 churches, including the cathedral, which is much admired. The harbour is one of the safest in the Mediterranean, and has a quay about a mile in length. A great trade is carried on here in silk, oil, fruit, corn, and excellent wine. This city suffered much by an earthquake in 1770; and also in 1683, when it was half destroyed. It has since been rebuilt, with elegant houses only two stories high. For several years prior to the peace of 1814, Messina was the head-quarters of the British troops in Sicily. It is seated on the strait of Messina, which separates Sicily from Calabria, 130 m. E. of Palermo. Long. 15. 50. E., lat. 38. 10. N.

Messing, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Aichstat. 14 m. N. N. E. of Aichstat.

Mostre, a town of Austrian Italy, in Treviso 8 m. N. W. of Venice.

Mesurado, a considerable river of W. Africa, which falls into the Atlantic on the Grain Coast. On its banks is a kingdom of the same name, the boundaries of which are very uncertain. See Liberia.

Mesurata, a sea-port of Tripoli, and the residence of a governor. Caravans travel hence to Fezzan and other interior parts of Africa, by which they carry on a great trade. It is 100 m. E. S. E. of Tripoli. Long. 15. 20. E., lat. 32. 0. N.

Meta, a large river of New Granada, which has its rise opposite to Santa Fe de Bogota, and falls into the Orinoco, about 450 m. from its source, in long. 67. 45. W., lat. 6. 10. N.

Metapura, a town of the isle of Borneo, in the kingdom of Banjermassing, 72 m. N. E. of Banjermassing and 100 S. E. of Negara.

Metcalfeborough, a village in Franklin Co. Ten.

Metelen, a town of Prussia, in the province of Westphalia, seated on the Vechta, 19 m. N. W. of Munster.

Metelin, or Mytilene, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, anciently called Lesbos, to the N. of Scio, and almost at the entrance of the gulf of Guesstro. It is about 40 m. long and 12 broad; somewhat mountainous, and has many hot springs. The soil is very good, and the mountains are in many places covered with wood. It produces good wheat, wine, oil, and the best figs in the Archipelago. Castro is the capital.

Methil, a town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, with a safe harbour on the frith of Forth, whence much coal is exported. 6 m. N. E. of Dysart.

Methuen, p.t. Essex Co. Mass. on the Merrimack, 30 m. N. Boston. Pop. 2,011. Here are manufactures of cotton and paper.

Methven, a town of Scotland, in Perthshire, where king Robert Bruce was defeated by the English in 1306. 6 m. W. N. W. of Perth.

Metro, a river of Italy, which rises on the frontiers of Tuscany, crosses the duchy of Urbino and enters the gulf of Venice near Fano.

Metropoli, a town of the island of Candia, on the site of the ancient Gortyna, of which many vestiges remain. 22 m. S. S. W. of Candia.

Metz, a town of France, in the department of Moselle, and formerly the capital of the kingdom of Austrasia. The fortifications are excellent, and it has three citadels and noble barracks. The cathedral is one of the finest in Europe. Here are manufactures of cotton, linen, gauze, chintz, fustian, &c.; and a considerable trade in leather, wine, brandy, &c. The sweetmeats made here are in high esteem. Metz is the seat of the department administration and a bishop's see, and contains nearly 42,000 inhabitants. It is seated at the conflux of the Moselle and Seille, 210 m.

N. E. of Paris. Long. 6. 10. E., lat. 49. ° N.

Metzow, a range of mountains in European Turkey, separating Albania from Thessaly. It is the ancient Pindus. There is a village of this name among the mountains.

Moudon, a village of France, with a magnificent royal palace and park; seated on the Seine, 6 m. S. of Paris.

Moulon, a town of France, department of Seine-et-Oise; seated on the Seine, over which is a stone bridge of 21 arches, 26 m. N. W. of Paris.

Mours, or Moers, a town of the Prussian states, capital of a small principality of the same name. It has a castle, and was formerly a place of strength, but its fortifications were destroyed in 1764. 16 m. N. E. of Dusseldorf.

Mourthe, a town of France, including part of the former province of Lorraine. It is bounded by the department of Moselle, Vooges, and Meuse, and comprises an area of 2,500 sq. m., with 365,600 inhabitants. The climate is temperate, and the soil in general fertile. Nancy is the capital.

Mourthe, a river of France, which rises in the department of Vosges, and flows by Luneville and Nancy into the Moselle.

Meuse, a river which rises in France, in the department of Upper Marne. It enters the Netherlands at Givet, flows to Charlemont, Namur, Huy, Liege, Maestricht, Ruremonde, Venlo, Grave, Battenburg, Ravestern, Gorcum (where it receives the Waal), and Worcum. At Dort it divides into four principal branches, the most northern of which is called the Merve. These form the island of Ysselmonde, Voorn, and Overslackee, and enters the German Ocean below Briel, Helvoetsluys and Goree.

Meuse, a department of France, including the former duchy of Bar. It is bounded by the grand duchy of Luxembourg, and the departments of Moselle, Vooges, Marne, and Ardennes, and comprises an area of 2,500 sq. m. with 285,000 inhabitants. Bar sur Ormain is the capital.

Mewar, an extensive district of Hindoostan, province of Agimere, lying chiefly between 25. and 26. of N. lat.

Mewat, a hilly and woody tract of Hindoostan lying on the S. W. of Dehli, confining the low country, along the W. bank of the Jumna, to a comparatively narrow slip, and extending westward 130 m. From N. to S. it is 90 m. Its inhabitants, the Mewatti, have been ever characterized as the most savage and brutal, and are still noted as thieves and robbers. The country contains some strong fortresses on steep or inaccessible hills. It is nominally possessed by the rajah of Macherry.

Mexicano, or Adayas, a river of New Mexico, on the confines of Louisiana, which runs into the gulf of Mexico.

Mexico, a country of N. America, now forming an independent republic, situated between 42. and 113. W. long., and extending from the Pacific Ocean to the Carribean Sea, the gulf of Mexico and the Sabine River. It comprises an area of 1,700,000 sq. m. with about 7,000,000 of inhabitants. In general it is a mountainous country intermixed with many rich valleys: the highest mountains many of which are volcanoes, are near the coast of the Pacific Ocean. The eastern shore is a flat country, full of impenetrable forests, with bogs and morasses, overflowed in the rainy season, which is from April to September. Although a considerable portion of Mexico is within the torrid zone, the climate in general is temperate and healthy. No country abounds more with grain, fruits, roots, and vegetables, many of them peculiar to the country, or at least to America. It is also celebrated for its mines of gold and silver, and has quarries of jasper and porphyry, and exquisite marble. Cochineal is almost peculiar to this country; its indigo and cocoa are superior to any in America; and its logwood has long been an important article of commerce. Among the quadrupeds are the puma, jaguar, bears, elks, wolves, deer, &c. The peccary of this country is sometimes called the Mexican hog. These animals frequent the mountainous and woody parts and go in large herds together. They commit great ravages among the sugar-canes, maize, manihot and potato fields. In Guiana the Indians shoot them with poisoned arrows blown through a tube. The domestic animals of Europe, particularly horned cattle, have multiplied here, almost with incredible rapidity. Numbers of these having been suffered to run wild, now range over the vast plains, in herds from 30,000 to 40,000; they are killed merely for the sake of their hides, which are annually exported, in vast quantities, to Europe. The inhabitants consist of native Spaniards, Creoles, who are descendants of Europeans; Mulattoes, the issue of whites and negroes; Mestizoes, descendants of whites and Indians; Zamboes, descendants of negroes and Indians; and African negroes, with whom are classed a mixed extraction from Europeans, Africans, Indians, and Malays or others of Asiatic origin. Far from becoming extinct, the indigenous population goes on increasing, especially during the last hundred years; and accordingly, it would appear that, in total amount, these countries are more populous at present than they were previously to the arrival of Europeans. The kingdom of Montezuma did not equal in extent the eighth part of New Spain as it now exists. The great towns of the Aztecs, and their most cultivated lands were met with in the environs of the capital of Mexico, and particularly in the delicious valley of Tenochtitlan. The kings of Alcolhuacan, of Tlacopan, and of Mechoacan, were independent princes. Beyond the parallel of 20. were the Chichimegs and Otomites, two wandering and barbarous nations, whose hordes, though far from numerous, pushed their incursions as far as Tula, a town situated near the northern border of the valley of Tenochtitlan. It would be just as difficult however to estimate, with any degree of accuracy, the number of Montezuma's subjects, as it would be to decide respecting the ancient population of Egypt, Persia, Carthage, or Greece, or even with regard to many modern states. History presents us, on the one hand, with a train of conquerors ambitious to throw additional lustre on their own exploits; on the other, religious and sensible men directing with noble ardour the arms of eloquence against the cruelty of the first colonists. Both parties were equally interested in exaggerating the flourishing condition of the newly discovered countries. At all events, the extensive ruins of towns and villages that are met with in the 18. and 20. of latitude in the interior of Mexico, seem to prove that the population of this single part of the kingdom was once far superior to what it is now. Yet it must be remarked that these ruins are dispersed over a space that, relatively speaking, is but very limited.

To a great degree of muscular strength, the copper-coloured natives add the advantage of being seldom or never subject to any deformity. M. Humboldt assures us that he never saw a hunch-back Indian, and that they very seldom squint, or are met with either lame or wanting the use of their arms. In those countries where the inhabitants suffer from the goitre, this affection of the thyroid gland is never observed among the Indians, and rarely among the Mestizoes. The Indians of New Spain, and especially the women, generally live to an advanced age. Their hair, it is said, never turns grey, and they preserve all their strength till the period of their death. In respect of the moral faculties of the indigenous Mexicans, it is difficult to form a just estimate of them, if we consider this unhappy nation almost in the only light in which there has been an opportunity of viewing it by intelligent travellers, as sinking under long oppression, and depressed almost to the lowest pitch of degradation.

In his present condition, the Mexican Indian is grave, melancholy, and taciturn, as long as he is not under the influence of intoxicating liquors. This gravity is particularly remarkable in the children of Indians, who at the early age of four or five years display infinitely greater intelligence and developement of mind than the children of whites. They delight in throwing an air of mystery over their most trifling remarks. Not a passion manifests itself in their features. At all times sombre, there is something terrific in the change, when he passes all at once from a state of absolute repose to violent and ungovernable agitation. The energy of his character, to which every shade of softness is unknown, habitually degenerates into ferocity. This is especially the case with the inhabitants of Tlascala. In the midst of their degradation, the descendants of these republicans are still distinguished by a certain haughtiness with which they are inspired by the remembrance of their former greatness.

The Mexicans have preserved a particular taste for painting and for the art of carving on stone and wood. It is truly astonishing to see what they are capable of executing with a bad knife upon the hardest wood and stone. They exercise themselves in painting the images, and carving the statues of saints; but from a religious principle, they have continued to servilely imitate for 300 years, the models which the Europeans brought with them at the period of the original conquest. In Mexico as well as Hindoostan, the faithful are not allowed to make the smallest change in their idols; every thing connected with the rites of the Aztecs was subjected to immutable laws: It is on this very account that the Christian images have preserved in some degree, that stiffness and hardness of feature which characterised the hieroglyphical pictures of the age of Montezuma. They display a great deal of aptitude for the exercise of the arts of imitation, and still greater for those of a purely mechanical nature.

When an Indian has attained a certain degree of cultivation, he shows great facility in acquiring information, a spirit of accuracy and precision, and a particular tendency to subtilize, or to seize on the minutest differences in objects that are to be compared with each other. He reasons coldly and with method; but he does not evince that activity of imagination, that lively freshness of sentiment, that art of producing, which characterises the people of Europe and many tribes of African negroes. The music and dancing of the indigenous natives partake of that want of cheerfulness which is so peculiar to them. Their singing is of a melancholy description. More vivacity, however, is observed in their women than in their men; but they share the evils of that state of subjection to which the sex is condemned among most of those nations where civilization is still imperfect. In the dance women take no part; they are merely present for the sake of offering to the dancers the fermented drinks which they themselves had prepared.

The Mexican Indians have likewise preserved the same taste for flowers that Cortez noticed in his time. We are astonished to discover this taste, which doubtless indicates a taste for the beautiful, among the people in whom a sanguinary worship, and the frequency of human sacrifices appears to have extinguished every feeling connected with sensibility of mind and the softer affections. In the great market of Mexico, the native does not even sell fish, or ananas, or vegetables, or fermented liquor, without his shop being decked out with flowers, which are renewed every succeeding day. The Indian shop-keeper appears seated behind a perfect entrenchment of verdure and every thing around him wears an air of the most refined elegance.

The Indian hunters, such as the Mecos, the Apaches, and the Lipans, whom the Spaniards comprehend under the denomination of Indios bravos, and whose hordes in their incursions which are often made during night, infest the frontiers of New Biscay, Sonora, and New Mexico, evince more activity of mind, and more strength of character, than the agricultural Indians. Some tribes have even languages, the mechanism of which appears to prove the existence of ancient civilization. They have great difficulty in learning the European idioms, while, at the same time they express themselves in their own with an extreme degree of facility. These same Indian chiefs, whose gloomy taciturnity astonishes the observer, will hold a discourse of several hours, whenever any strong interest rouses them to break their habitual silence. This whole country was long under the dominion of Spain, and governed by a viceroy. The first attempt to assume independence took place in 1810. In 1824 a federal government was established. Numerous disturbances have since arisen, and the country is still far from being in a settled state.

Mexico, the capital of the above country. It was a flourishing city before the Spaniards entered the country, and was seated on several islands, in a salt-water lake, called Tezcuco, to which there was no entrance, but by three cause-ways, 2 m. in length each. The circumference of the city, exclusive of the suburbs, was formerly above 10 m. and it contained at least 80,000 houses, with several large temples, and three palaces. It was taken by Ferdinando Cortez, in 1521, after a siege of nearly three months, and, as the Mexicans defended themselves from street to street, it was almost ruined, but was afterwards rebuilt by the Spaniards. The water in the neighborhood of the city has dried up, and Mexico is now three miles distant from the shores of the lake. The streets are wide and straight, but badly paved. The houses present a magnificent appearance, being built of porphyry and amygdaloid. Several palaces and private mansions have a majestic effect, and its churches glitter with metallic riches. The cathedral surpasses, in this respect, all the churches in the world; the balustrade which surrounds the great altar being composed of massive silver. A lamp of the same metal, is of so vast a size that three men go into it when it is to be cleaned; and it is enriched with lions' heads, and other ornaments of pure gold. The statues of the Virgin and the saints are either made of solid silver, or richly gilded, and ornamented with precious stones. Palaces, mansions of great families, beautiful fountains, and extensive squares, adorn the interior of this city. To the north, near the suburbs, is the principal public promenade, or Alameda. Round this walk flows a rivulet, forming a fine square, in the middle of which there is a basin with a fountain. Eight alleys of trees terminate here, in the figure of a star. But in consequence of an unfortunate proximity, immediately in front of the alameda, the eye discovers the Quemadero, a place where Jews and other victims of the terrible Inquisition, were burned alive. This detestable tribunal was finally abolished by the Emperor Augustin Iturbide in 1820. In the fine evenings, during the dry season, the environs of the city present a scene of pleasure, gaiety, and bustle, scarcely to be paralleled; hundreds of canoes, on the canal of Chalco, of various sizes, mostly with awnings, crowded with native Indians, neatly dressed, and their heads crowned with the most gaudy flowers, are seen passing in every direction; each boat, with its musician seated on the stern, playing on the guitar, and some of the party singing, dancing, or both united. Revolution has had its usual operation here; it has reduced the overgrown, but insecure wealth of the rich, to an independent protected competence; but it has also wiped away the tears, and broken the chains which galled the innocent people whose labours had amassed it.

M. de Humboldt saw erecting, in the great square of Mexico, an equestrian and colossal statue of the king of Spain, by M. Tolza, "a statue," says he, "which, by its imposing mass, and the noble simplicity of its style, might adorn the first cities of Europe. According to the accounts of Spanish authors, balls, and games of hazard, are pursued with ardour, while the more noble enjoyments of the drama are less generally relished. To vivid passions the Mexican Spaniard adds a great fund of stoicism. He enters a gaming-house, loses all his money upon a single card, and then takes out his cigar from behind his ear, and smokes as if nothing had happened.

Mexico preserves few monuments of antiquity. The ruins of aqueducts, the stone of sacrifices, and the calender stone, both of which are placed in the great square of the city; manuscripts, or hieroglyphical tables, badly preserved in the archives of the vice-regal palace; and finally, the colossal statue of the goddess Teo-Yacumiqui, lying on its back in one of the galleries of the University, are all that remains worthy of notice in this city. But, to the north-east of the town, and of the lake Tezcuco, on the little hills of Totihuacan, are seen the imposing remains of two pyramids, consecrated to the sun and moon, and, according to some historians, constructed by the Olmec, an ancient nation that came to Mexico from the east, that is to say, from some country situated on the Atlantic Ocean. The pyramid, or house of the sun, (Tonatiu-ytzaqual), is 171 feet high, and its base measures 645 feet; that of the moon, (Mexli-ytzaqual), is thirty feet smaller. These monuments appear to have served as models for the Tzocallis, or houses of the gods, constructed by the Mexicans in the capital and other parts of the country; but the pyramids are incased by a thick wall of stone. They formerly supported statues covered with very thin leaves of gold. A few small pyramids, which appear to have been dedicated to the stars, surround the two great ones. The situation of Mexico is highly favorable for carrying on commerce both with Europe and Asia, being about 69 leagues distant from Vera Cruz on the one hand and from Acapulco on the other. The working of gold and silver has long been carried to great perfection here, and here are also manufactures of calico, cloth, soap, and tobacco. This city has been frequently inundated by the overflowing of the lakes in its vicinity, particularly in 1623, when 40,000 persons are said to have been drowned. To prevent the recurrence of such calamities, a vast conduit was constructed to turn the course of the waters which formerly flowed into the lake Tezcuco through the mountains. 200 m. E. N. E. of St. Juan de Ulhua. Long. 100. 40. W., lat. 20. 4. N.

Michigan, a territory of the United States, the western part of which is sometimes called the Territory of Huron. It was formerly limited to the peninsula enclosed between Lakes Michigan and Huron, but now comprising also that tract called the Northwest Territory. It is bounded N. by Canada and Lake Superior, E. by Lakes Huron, St. Clair and Erie, and S. by Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. It extends from 41. 31. to 49. N. lat. and from 82. to 98. W. long. containing about 180,000 sq. m. This territory is intersected in the eastern part by Lake Michigan and washed on the western limit by the Mississippi. Except the peninsula, the country has been little explored. It is everywhere level except in the western part, south of Lake Superior, where are some mountain ranges call the Ocooch Mountains and Porcupine Hills. The peninsula is a complete level with but just sufficient elevation in the centre to give the rivers a direction to the shores of the lakes. The country consists mostly of prairies and forest, but the greater part is covered with wood. It is watered by numerous rivers, as the Ouisconsin, Chippeway, St. Francis, Missisagaigon, St. Croix, St. Louis, Wolf, Fox, Menomenies, Saginaw, Grand, Kallimazo, St. Joseph, Raisin, and others. The western parts abound with wild animals, as bison, elks, bears, deer, beaver, otters, muskrats, &c. The elk is very similar to the rein deer. He is 4 or 5 feet in height, and feeds upon the buds and tender twigs of the forest. He is shy and has very acute senses. His flesh is highly esteemed by the hunters and Indians, and the horns when soft are a great delicacy. The elk has often been domesticated.

The soil is various: the alluvions of the rivers are fertile; along the shore of Lake Michigan it is sandy and sterile. The chief mineral production is lead, for which see Lead Mines. Copper was formerly thought to exist here in great abundance, but this does not appear to be the case. Iron is found in various parts. The climate of the southern parts is mild, but in the north the winters are severe. One of the most valuable natural productions is the wild rice which grows on the marshy borders of the lakes and rivers. It grows in 6 or 7 feet depth of water where the bottom is muddy; the stalk is 12 or 14 feet in length; the leaves and spikes resembles those of oats. Sheaves of them are bound together while growing, to preserve them from the birds who resort to these spots in millions for the purpose of feeding upon the rice. After it has ripened in this manner, the Indians row their canoes through the rice and beat the grain with sticks into the canoes where blankets are spread to receive it.

There are many Indians residing in this territory. The tribes are the Chippewas, Winnebagoes, Menomonees and Ottawas. Their numbers amount to about 30,000. A very great proportion of the county is still in a wild state, and the settlements are chiefly within the peninsula. The counties in the territory are 18. The pop. exclusive of Indians is 31,260 of whom 37 are slaves. Detroit is the capital. The Methodists have 11 preachers in the territory; the Presbyterians 6; the Episcopalians 5; the Baptists 2; and there are some Catholics.

A settlement was made here at Detroit by the French, so early as 1670, but they never occupied much of the country. The territorial government was established in 1806. The peninsula was overrun by the British in 1812 shortly after the commencement of the war, but they were driven from the territory by General Harrison the next year.

Michigan, Lake, one of the great chain of lakes in North America. It lies wholly within the limits of the United States, inclosed in the territory above described. It is 290 m. in length, 55 in breadth, and 800 in circumference. It communicates with Lake Huron at the northern extremity by the Strait of Michilimackinac, which has 12 feet depth of water. The lake is deep enough to be navigated by ships of any burden. It abounds with fine trout, sturgeon and various other kinds of fish. Canals are in contemplation to connect it with the waters of the Mississippi.

Middlesex, a county of England, bounded N. by Hertfordshire, E. by Essex, S. by Surrey and Kent, and W. by Buckinghamshire. It contains an area of 179,200 acres, has two cities (London and Westminster) and seven market towns, and sends eight members to parliament. The air is healthy; but the soil in general, being gravelly, is not naturally fertile, though by means of its vicinity to the metropolis many parts of it are converted into rich beds of manure, clothed with almost perpetual verdure. Besides the Thames, Lea, and Coln, which are its boundaries to the S. E. and W. Middlesex is watered by several small streams, one of which, called the New River, is artificially brought from near Hertford, for the purpose of supplying London with water.

Middlesex, a county of Massachusetts. Pop. 77,968. Cambridge is the capital. A county of Connecticut. Pop. 24,845. Middletown is the capital. A county of New Jersey. Pop. 23,157. New Brunswick is the capital. A county of the E. district of Virginia. Pop. 4,122. Urbana is the capital.

Milan, or the Milanese, a country of Italy bounded on the N. by the Alps, E. by the Venetian territory, S. by the Apennines, and W. by Piedmont. The soil is every where fertile in corn, wine, fruits, rice, and olives; and there are also plenty of cattle. The rivers are the Seccia, Ticino, Adda, Oglio, and Po. There are likewise several lakes, the three principal of which are those of Maggiore, Como, and Lugano. Milan, with other countries in Italy, was long comprised under the general name of Lombardy. In the 14th century it became a duchy. The campaign of prince Eugene, in 1706, put it in possession of the house of Austria, to whom, with the exception of the Sardinian Milanese, it continued subject during 90 years, until the victories of Napoleon in 1796. In 1797 it was formed into four departments, as the Cisalpine republic; but in 1814 after several other changes, the part belonging to the king of Sardinia was restored, and the remainder incorporated with the Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom, or Austrian Italy. The Austrian Milanese forms, along with the duchy of Mantua and the Valteline, the government of Milan. It is divided into 8 delegations, and contains 7,700, sq. m., with 2,100,000 inhabitants. The Sardinian Milanese, which lies to the W. of the Austrian, is divided into 9 districts, comprising an area of 3,300 square miles, and containing 560,000 inhabitants.

Milan, a city of Italy, capital of the Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom, and the see of an archbishop.
The city is 10 m. in circumference; but the garden grounds are so extensive that it does not contain above 140,000 inhabitants. It stands in a delightful plain, between the rivers Adda and Ticino, which communicate with the city by means of two canals. The cathedral, in the centre of the city, is a splendid specimen of Gothic architecture, and, next to St. Peter's at Rome, is the most considerable in Italy. This vast fabric is built of white marble, supported by 50 columns, and adorned, within and without, by a prodigious number of marble statues. The other public buildings are the university, several colleges, the convents, the hospitals, the theatres, the mansions of the minister of finance, of the minister of the interior, and of the archbishop, and the former du-cal palace, now the residence of the Austrian viceroy. In the Piazza di Castello is an arena in imitation of the amphitheatre of Verona, which is capable of containing 30,000 spectators. The college of St. Ambrose has a library, which, besides a prodigious number of manuscripts, contains 60,000 printed books; and its superb gallery is adorned with rich paintings. The chief trade of Milan is in grain (especially rice), cattle, and cheese; and the manufactures of silk and velvet stuffs, stockings, handkerchiefs, ribands, gold and silver lace and embroideries, woolen and linen cloths, glass, porcelain, &c. It has been many times taken in the wars that have desola-ted Italy. The French took it in 1796. It was retaken by the Austrians and Russians in 1799; but again possessed by the French in 1800, and retained by them till the fall of Napoleon in 1814.

Milford, a town of Wales, in Pembrokeshire. It is elegantly and uniformly built, and stands on the N. side of Milford Haven, a deep inlet of the Irish Sea. The haven branches off into so many creeks, secured from all winds, that it is esteemed the safest and most capacious harbour in Great Britain. At the entrance on the W. point, called St. Ann's, is an old lighthouse, and a blockhouse. Here the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., landed, on his enterprise against Richard III. A quay and several good buildings have been constructed by a company from Nantucket, who have formed an establishment here for the southern whale fishery.

Milo, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 381.

Milo, the ancient Melos, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, 18 leagues in circumference, with one of the best and largest harbours in the Mediterranean. It produces plentiful crops of corn, excellent fruit, and wine; abounds in very good cattle, especially goats, and has mines of iron, and sulphur. In this island are curious subterranean galleries, the roofs of which are covered with genuine capillary or plume alum, and the crevices of the rocks filled with pure sulphur. Here are two bishops: one of the Greek, and the other of the Latin church. At the commencement of the 18th century the inhabitants amounted to above 20,000, but since that period it has declined. It now belongs to Independent Greece, yet a considerable time must elapse before it can recover its former opulence and splendor. The population of the whole island does not at present exceed 1,200. On the E. side of the island is a town of the same name, 60 m. N. of Candia, and 100 S. by E. of Athens. Long. 25. 0. E., lat. 36. 41. N.

Miltenberg, a town of the Bavarian states, principality of Leiningen, with a castle on a hill; seated on the Maine. 20 m. S. S. E. of Aschaffenburg.

Millthorpe, a town in Westmoreland, Eng. seated on the Cetha, near the mouth of the Ken. It is the only port in the county, and hence the fine Westmoreland slates and other commodities are exported. The manufactures consist chiefly of sacking, twine, and paper: in the vicinity are limestone and marble quarries. 255 m. N. N. W. of London.

Milton, a town of Kent, Eng. It is noted for excellent oysters; and much corn, &c. is shipped here for the London markets. It is a place of great antiquity, and was the residence of the king of Kent, and of Alfred, who had a palace here. 14 m. N. E. of Maidstone, and 40 E. of London.

Milton, p.t. Norfolk Co. Mass. 7 m. S. Boston, on Neponset river which is navigable hence to the sea for vessels of 150 tons. Here are manufactures of paper and chocolate. Pop. 1,565. Milton Hill in this town, is an abrupt and rocky eminence, from which one of the most enchanting prospects in the world may be enjoyed, comprising the city and bay of Boston, the ocean, and a wide extent of country delightfully variegated with hills, valleys, cultivated fields, towns and villages. In very clear air the White Mountains of New Hampshire have been discovered from this spot.

Ken., Rutherford and Lincoln Cos. Ten. and 5 townships in Ohio.

Milton Abbas, or Abbey Milton, a village in Dorsetshire, Eng. 7 m. S. W. of Blandford. It formerly had an abbey, founded by king Athelstan, but the whole was swept away, except the church in 1771, by the earl of Dorchester, who erected on its site a large Gothic mansion. The village, with its church and almshouse, were built by the same nobleman.

Mina, a town of Persia, province of Kerman, surrounded by a wall with towers, and seated on the Ibrahim, near its entrance into the gulf of Ormus, 190 m. S. of Kerman. Long. 56. 50. E., lat. 26. 40. N.

Mina, p.t. Chataouque Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,318.

Minas, a town of S. America, in Buenos Ayres, seated near the source of the river St. Lucia, 34 m. N. E. of Maldonado. Long. 55. 5. W., lat. 34. 21. S.

Minasville, p.t. Montgomery Co. N. Y.

Minas Gerais, a province of Brazil, bounded N. by Bahia, W. by Goiaz, and S. by the Parai-buna. It extends 600 or 700 m. from N. to S. nearly the same from E. to W., and contains 390,000 inhabitants. This vast territory produces gold and diamonds in abundance; also iron, antimony, bismuth, platina, chromate of lead, &c. The soil is likewise rich, producing in the valleys sugar, cotton, &c.; and in the higher grounds wheat, and generally all kinds of European grain.

Minch, an arm of the sea, on the W. coast of Scotland, which separates the Isle of Sky from Lewis Island.

Minching Hampton, a town of Gloucestershire, Eng. with a considerable manufacture of cloth. It is pleasantly situated on a declivity, 10 m. W. of Cirencester and 98 W. of London.

Mincio, a river of Italy, which flows S. from the lake Garda, forms the lake and marshes that surround Mantua, and afterward runs into the Po.

Minckendorf, a town of Austria, on the Triesting, 6 m. E. N. E. of Baden.

Mindanao, an island in the Eastern seas, and one of the Philippines, about 300 m. long and 108 broad. The coast is indented by numerous bays, and the interior is intersected by chains of lofty mountains, with intervening plains that afford pasture for immense herds of cattle. The sides of the hills and valleys are stony, and yet there are tall trees, of kinds unknown in Europe. Some of the mountains yield very good gold; and the valleys are well watered with rivulets. Rice is produced in abundance; as are also plantains, cocoa-nuts, sweet potatoes, and all the fruits common to tropical climates. There are neither lions nor tigers, but horses, bees, buffaloes, goats, hogs, deer, &c., are numerous. The fowls are ducks, hens, pigeons, parrots, paroquets and turtle-doves, besides many small birds. The inhabitants are generally of a low stature, with little heads, small black eyes, short noses, and large mouths. Their hair is black and straight, and their complexion tawny, but more inclined to yellow than that of other Indians. The chief trades are goldsmiths, blacksmiths, and carpenters, who can build pretty good vessels. Polygamy is practised. The government is partly feudal and partly monarchical. The prevailing religion is Mahomedism, but the Spaniards have been in possession of a large portion of the sea-coast to the W., N. and N. E., where they have planted colonies of Christians.

Mindanao, the capital of the above island, and the residence of the sultan and his court, is about 6 m. up the Pelangy. Opposite stands the town of Selangan. Long. 124. 40. E., lat. 7. 9. N.

Mindelheim, a town in Bavaria, with a castle on a mountain, situate between the rivers Iller and Lech, 25 m. S. W. of Augsburg.

Minden, a government of the Prussian states comprising the N. E. part of the province of Westphalia and the former principalities of Minden, Paderborn, Rittberg, and Corvey, the bailiwick of Reckeberg, and the lordship of Rheda. It has an area of 2,000 sq. m. divided into 13 districts, with 330,000 inhabitants. The soil in general is fertile, and the pasturage good.

Minden, the capital of the above government is one of the oldest towns of Germany, and, while the see of a bishop, formed a petty republic. Its convenient situation for trade and navigation, its breweries, sugar-houses, and wax manufactures, are great advantages to the inhabitants. Near this town prince Ferdinand, of Brunswick, defeated the French in 1759. It was occupied in 1806 by the French, and finally ceded to Prussia in 1814. It is seated on the Weser, 43 m. E. of Osnaburg. Long. 8. 56. E., lat. 52. 19. N.

Minden, a township of Montgomery Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,567.

Mindoro, one of the Philippines, separated from Luzon by a narrow channel. It is mountainous, and abounds in palm-trees and all sorts of fruits. The inhabitants are pagans, and pay tribute to the Spaniards.

Minersville, a village in Schuylkill Co. Pa. surrounded by extensive coal mines.

Mineros, a township of Essex Co. N. Y. Pop. 358; p.v. Mason Co. Ken.

Minehead, p.t. Essex Co. Vt. on the Connecticut. Pop. 150.

Mine Shibolet, p.v. Washington Co. Missouri, 55 m. S. W. St. Louis. Here is one of the richest lead mines in the country.

Minehead, a borough and sea-port in Somersetshire, Eng. It has a good harbour on the Bristol Channel, and carries on a trade in wool, coal, and herrings. 31 m. N. of Exeter and 160 W. by S. of London. Long. 3. 34. W., lat. 51. 12. N.

Mingrelia, a country of Asia, bounded W. by the Black Sea, E. by Imeritia, S. by the river Phasis, and N. by Georgia. It is governed by a prince who is tributary to Russia. The face of this country, its products, and the customs and manners of the inhabitants, are similar to those of Georgia.

Minho, a river of Spain, which rises in the N. E. part of Galicia, passes by Lugo, Orense, and Tuy, and dividing Galicia from Portugal, enters the Atlantic at Caminha.

Minia, a town of Egypt, on the left bank of the Nile, 90 m. S. of Fayoum.

Minisink, p.t. Orange Co. N. Y. on the Delaware. Pop. 4,979.

Minervino, a town of Naples, in Terra di Bari 24 m. W. S. W. of Trani.

Minorca, one of the Balearic islands, lying 50 m.

to the N. E. of Majorca. It is 30 m. long and 12 broad; and is a mountainous country, with some fruitful valleys. Some corn is raised, but the principal products of the island are wine, wool, cheese, and various fruits. It has been frequently in the hands of the British, by whom it was taken without the loss of a man in 1798, but given up at the peace of 1802. Ciudadella is the capital; but Mahon claims greater consequence, on account of its excellent harbour, Port Mahon, which is defended by two forts. Long. 3. 48. E., lat. 39. 51. N.

Minot, p.t. Cumberland Co. Me. Pop. 2,906.

Minsk, an extensive province of European Russia, comprehending the old palatinate of Minsk and portions of Polotsk, Novogrodek, and Wilna. It extends from the Dwina N. to the province of Volhynia, comprises an area of 37,000 sq. m. is divided into ten circles, and contains 950,000 inhabitants. The surface, productions, &c. are the same as in Lithuania.

Minsk, the capital of the foregoing province, with two citadels, is seated on the Swialocz, 80 m. S. E. of Wilna and 310 E. N. E. of Warsaw. Long. 27. 58. E., lat. 53. 46. N.

Mintaon, an island in the Indian Ocean, 40 m. long and 14 broad, on the W. coast of the island of Sumatra. Long. 97. 38. E., lat. 0. 25. S.

Mioss, a lake of Norway, in the province of Hedemarke, 90 m. in circumference. It is almost divided by a peninsula, and contains a fertile island 10 m. in circumference.

Miquelon, a small desert island, S. W. of Cape Ray in Newfoundland, ceded to the French in 1763, for drying and curing their fish. They were dispossessed of it by the English in 1793, but it was restored to them in 1802. Long. 56. 10. W., lat. 46. 49. N.

Mira, a town of Portugal, in Beira, 16 m. N. W. of Coimbra.

Miranda, a town of Portugal, in Tras os Montes, seated on a rock, on the river Douro, 32 m. E. S. E. of Braganza. Long. 6. 32. W., lat. 41. 46. N.

Miranda de Corvo, a town of Portugal, in Beira, 13 m. S. E. of Coimbra.

Miranda de Ebro, a town of Spain, in the province of Burgos, with a castle; seated in an excellent wine country, on the river Ebro, over which is a handsome bridge. 34 m. N. E. of Burgos.

Mirande, a town of France, department of Gers. Wool, down, and the feathers of geese, are its principal articles of trade. It is seated on an eminence, near the river Baise, 13 m. S. W. of Auch.

Mirandela, a town of Portugal, in Tras os Montes. 22 m. S. W. of Braganza.

Mirandola, a city of Italy, in the Modenese, capital of a province of its name, and a bishop's see, with a citadel and a fort. Besides the cathedral, it contains many fine churches and convents. It is 18 m. N. N. E. of Modena. Long. 11. 19. E., lat. 44. 52. N.

Miraval, a town of Spain, in New Castile, with a strong castle; seated on the side of a hill, 16 m. S. by W. of Placentia.

Mirebeau, a town of France, department of Upper Vienne, 14 m. N. by W. of Poitiers.

Mirebeau, a town of France, department of Cote d'Or, 13 m. N. of Dijon.

Mirecourt, a town of France, department of Vosges, famous for its violins and fine lace; seated on the Madon, 15 m. W. N. W. of Epinal.

Miremont, a town of France, department of Dordogne. Near it is a remarkable cavern, called Clusean. It is seated near the river Vézère, 15 m. E. of Bergerac.

Mirepoix, a town of France, department of Ariège; seated on the Gers, 15 m. E. N. E. of Foix, and 43 S. S. E. of Toulouse.

Misere, a town of Saxony with a castle, 11 m. W. of Strelitz.

Misagro, a town of Naples, in Otranto, 6 m. S. S. E. of Ostuni.

Mistra, or Mistras, a town of Independent Greece, once the capital of the Morea and a place of importance, but it is now decayed. It is 90 m. S. E. Lepanto. In the neighbourhood are to be seen the ruins of ancient Sparta.

Misnia. See Meissen.

Mississippi, a river of the United States, rising in a number of head streams between 47. and 48. N. lat. and flowing into the Gulf of Mexico. It is more than 3,000 m. in length and receives from the west the Missouri, which on account of its superior length is sometimes considered the main stream rather than a branch of the Mississippi. The other tributaries of the Mississippi are the Ohio, Illinois, Arkansas, and Red river with a great many inferior streams. The falls of St. Anthony, are in the upper part of its course, and have a perpendicular descent of 17 ft.; below the point the river is navigable for vessels of 30 tons to the sea. It runs but a little distance from its source, before it becomes a considerable stream. Below the falls of St. Anthony, it broadens to half a mile in width; and is a clear, placid and noble stream, with wide and fertile bottoms, for a long distance. A few miles below the river Des Moines, is a long rapid of nine miles, which, for a considerable part of the summer, is a great impediment to the navigation. Below these rapids the river assumes its medial width and character from that point to the entrance of the Missouri. It is a still more beautiful river, than the Ohio, somewhat gentler in its current, a third wider, with broad and clean sandbars, except in the time of high waters, when they are all covered. At every little distance, there are islands, sometimes a number of them parallel, and broadening the stream to a great width. These islands are many of them large, and have in the summer season an aspect of beauty, as they swell gently from the clear stream,—a vigour and grandeur of vegetation which contribute much to the magnificence of the river. The sandbars, in the proper season, are the resort of innumerable swans, geese and water fowls. It is, in general, a full mile in width from bank to bank. For a considerable distance above the mouth of the Missouri, it has more than that width. Altogether, it has, from its alternate bluffs and prairies, the calmness and transparency of its waters, the size and beauty of its trees, an aspect of great amenity and magnificence.

Where it receives the Missouri, it is a mile and a half wide. The Missouri itself enters with a mouth not more than half a mile wide. This united stream below, has thence to the mouth of the Ohio, a medial width of little more than three quarters of a mile. This mighty tributary seems rather to diminish, than increase its width; but it perceptibly alters its depth, its mass of waters, and wholly changes its character. It is no longer the gentle, placid stream, with smooth shores and clean sandbars; but has a furious and boiling current, a turbid and dangerous mass of sweeping waters, jagged and dilapidated shores, and, wherever its waters have receded, deposits of mud.

It remains a sublime object of contemplation. The noble forest still rises along its banks. But its character of calm magnificence, that so delighted the eye above, is seen no more.

The bosom of the river is covered with prodigious boils, or swells, that rise with a whirling motion, and a convex surface, two or three rods in diameter, and no inconsiderable noise, whirling a boat imperceptibly from its track. In its course, accidental circumstances shift the impetus of its current, and propel it upon the point of an island bend or sandbars. In these instances, it tears up the islands, removes the sandbars, and sweeps away the tender, alluvial soil of the bends, with all their trees, and deposits the spoils in another place. At the season of high water, nothing is more familiar to the ear of the people on the river, than the deep crash of a land-slip, in which larger or smaller masses of the soil on the banks, with all the trees, are plunged into the stream. The circumstances that change the aspect and current of the river, are denominated, in the vocabulary of the watermen, chutes, races, chains, sawyers, planters, points of islands, wreck heaps and cypress bends. The divinity most frequently invoked by boatmen, seems to have imparted his name oftener than any other to the dangerous places along the river. The 'Devil's' race paths, tea-table, oven, &c. are places of difficult or hazardous navigation, that frequently occur. They are serious impediments to the navigation of this noble stream. Such is its character from Missouri to the Balize; a wild, furious, whirling river,—never navigated safely, except with great caution. On the immense wreck heaps, where masses of logs, like considerable hills, are piled together, the numerous wrecks of boats, lying on their sides and summits, sufficiently attest the character of the river, and remain standing mementos to caution. Boats propelled by steam power, which can be changed in a moment, to reverse the impulse and direction of the boat, are exactly calculated to obviate the dangers of this river.

No person, who descends this river for the first time, receives clear and adequate ideas of its grandeur, and the amount of water which it carries. If it be in the spring, when the river below the mouth of the Ohio is generally over its banks, although the sheet of water that is making its way to the gulf is, perhaps, thirty miles wide, yet finding its way through deep forests and swamps that conceal all from the eye, no expanse of water is seen, but the width, that is curved out between the outline of woods on either bank; and it seldom exceeds, and oftener falls short of a mile. But when he sees, in descending from the falls of St. Anthony, that it swallows up one river after another, with mouths, as wide as itself, without affecting its width at all; when he sees it receiving in succession the mighty Missouri, the broad Ohio, St. Francis, White, Arkansas, and Red rivers, all of them of great depth, length and volume of water; when he sees this mighty river absorbing them all and retaining a volume, apparently unchanged,—he begins to estimate rightly the increasing depths of current, that must roll on in its deep channel to the sea. Carried out of the Balize, and sailing with a good breeze for hours, he sees nothing on any side, but the white and turbid waters of the Mississippi, long after he is out of sight of land.

From its source to the falls of St. Anthony, it runs alternately through wild rice lakes and swamps by limestone bluffs and craggy hills; occasionally through deep pine forests, and beautiful prairies; and the tenants on its borders are elk, buffaloes, bears and deer, and the savages that pursue them. In this distance, there is no a civilized inhabitant on its shores, if we except the establishments of Indian traders, and a garrison of the United States. Buffaloes are seldom seen below these falls. Its alluvions become wide, fertile, and for the most part, heavily timbered. Like the Ohio, its bottoms and bluffs generally alternate. Its broad and placid current is often embarrassed with islands, which are generally rich alluvial lands, often containing from five hundred to a thousand acres, and abounding with wild turkeys and other small game. From 100 m. above the mouth of the Missouri, it would be difficult for us to convey an idea of the beauty of the prairies, skirting this noble river. They are a perfect level; and are in summer covered with a luxuriant growth of grass and flowers without a tree or bush.

Below the mouth of the Ohio, in the season of inundation, to an observing spectator a very striking spectacle is presented. The river sweeps along in curves, or sections of circles, of an extent from six to twelve miles, measured from point to point. The sheet of water, that is visible between the forests on either side, is a mile wide. On a calm spring morning, and under a bright sun, it shines like a mass of burnished silver. Its edges are distinctly marked by a magnificent outline of cotton wood trees, generally of great size, and at this time of the year, of the brightest verdure. On the convex, or bar side of the bend, there is generally a vigorous growth of willows, or young cotton wood trees, of such astonishing regularity of appearance, that it always seems to the inexperienced spectator, a work of art. The water stands among these trees, from ten to fifteen feet in height. Those brilliant creatures the black and red bird, flit among these young groves, that are inundated to half their height. Nature is carrying on her most vigorous efforts of vegetation below. If there be wind or storm, the descending flat and keel boats immediately make for these groves, and plunge fearlessly, with all the headway they can command, among the trees. Should they be of half the size of the human body, struck fifteen feet from the ground, they readily bend before even a frail boat.—You descend the whole distance of a thousand miles to New Orleans, landing at night in fifteen feet water among the trees; but, probably, in no instance within twenty miles of the real shore, which is the bluff. The whole spectacle is that of a vast and magnificent forest, emerging from a lake, with its waters, indeed, in a thousand places in descending motion.

One of the most striking peculiarities of this river, and of all its lower tributaries, is the uniformity of its meanders, called in the phrase of the country, its 'points and bends.' In many instances these curves are described with a precision, with which they would have been marked off by the sweep of a compass. The river sweeps round, perhaps the half of a circle, and is precipitated from the point, in a current diagonally across its own channel, to another curve of the same regularity upon the opposite shore. In the bend is the deepest channel, the heaviest movement of waters, and what is called the thread of the current. Between this thread and the shore, there are generally counter currents, or eddies; and in the crumbling and tender alluvial soil, the river is generally making inroads upon its banks on the bend side. Opposite the bend there is always a sandbar, matched, in the convexity of its conformation, to the concavity of the bend. Here it is, that the appearance of the young cotton wood groves have their most striking aspect. The trees rise from the shore, showing first the vigorous saplings of the present year; and then those of a date of two and three years; and trees rising in regular gradation to the most ancient and lofty point of the forest. These curves are so regular on this, and all the rivers of the lower country, that the boatmen and Indians calculate distances by them; and instead of the number of miles or leagues, they estimate their progress by the number of bends they have passed.

The navigation upon this river is very great. Ships seldom ascend higher than Natchez. The number of steam-boats upon the Mississippi and its tributaries is about 300. Their size is from 540 tons downward. The passage from Cincinnati to New Orleans and back, has been made in 19 days. From New Orleans to Louisville the shortest passage has been 8 days and 2 hours, the distance being 1,650 m. and against the current. The steam-boats have generally high-pressure power, and many fatal explosions have happened upon these waters. The first steam-vessel here was built in 1810. New Orleans is the outpost of this river, and the largest city on its banks. Its waters pass into the Gulf by several channels which intersect a flat marshy tract. The main entrance is at the Balize.

Mississippi, one of the United States, bounded N. by Tennessee, E. by Alabama, S. by Louisiana and W. by Louisiana and Arkansas. It extends from 30.10. to 35. N. lat. and from 80. 30. to 81. 35. W. long. 336 m. in length from N. to S. and 150 in breadth, containing 45,760 sq. m. It is watered by the Mississippi on the western boundary, the Yazoo and Big Black rivers, branches of the Mississippi, the Pascagoula and Pearl which flow into the Gulf of Mexico, and the head streams of the Tombeckee rise in the N. part and pass into Alabama. There is a small extent of coast lying upon Lake Borgne at its outlet into the Gulf, along which are scattered a few low sandy islands but there is no sea-port of consequence in the state. Nearly the whole country is an alluvial flat, and the shore of the Mississippi in the north is an immense swamp 70 m. in width. In the N. E. part are some hilly, broken tracts. A great part of the soil is a pine barren, but the river intervals are rich and productive. Sugar-cane is raised in the south. The middle parts produce figs, grapes, tobacco, maize, sweet potatoes, rice, and indigo. Cotton is raised in all parts, and is the staple article of cultivation. The climate is hot, moist and in the level country is insalubrious. Stagnant waters are abundant, and the intense heat of the summer engenders bilious diseases. In the elevated parts the climate is healthy and pleasant.

The northern and central portions of this state are occupied by the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; the former tribe number about 21,000 souls and the latter 3,600; civilization and useful arts have made considerable progress among them; their agriculture is in a thriving state, and they have commodious houses, shops, schools and churches, and support a missionary. They occupy some of the best land in the state.

Mississippi is divided into 26 counties and has a population excluding Indians, of 136,806. The slaves are 65,659. Jackson, on Pearl river, is the seat of government. Natchez is the only considerable town. The legislature is styled the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The senators are elected for 3 years and one third of the number are renewed each year. The representatives are chosen yearly. All residents of one year are voters; clergymen are excluded from office. The Baptists are the largest religious sect, they have 58 churches; the Methodists have 23 preachers; the Presbyterians 25; the Episcopalians 4, and there are some Catholics. Education is provided for by a literary fund; public schools are maintained in some of the large towns, and there is a college at Washington near Natchez. The commerce of the state is directed to the outports of Louisiana and Alabama. Mississippi was erected into a territorial government in 1798. It was admitted into the Union in 1817.

Missolonghi, a town of Independent Greece, on the N. side of the Gulf of Lepanto, opposite Patras. It has a shallow harbour, and is surrounded by marshes. It was taken and retaken several times by the Turks and Greeks during the war of the revolution. Here Lord Byron died in 1824. There is another town of this name in the Morea.

Missouri, a river of the United States, which, taken in connexion with the Mississippi, into which it flows, is the longest river on the globe; its length from the highest navigable stream to the gulf of Mexico being 4,491 m., its length to the junction with the Mississippi is 3,096 m. It rises in the Rocky Mountains, nearly in the same parallel with the Mississippi. The most authentic information we have yet had of the sources of this mighty river, is from its first intrepid American discoverers, Lewis and Clarke. What may properly be called the Missouri seems to be formed by three considerable branches, which unite not far from the bases of the principal ranges of the mountains. To the northern they gave the name of Jefferson, to the middle, Gallatin, and to the southern, Madison.—Each of these branches forks again into a number of small mountain streams. It is but a short distance from some of these to the head waters of the Oregon, on the other side of the mountains. A person may drink from the spring sources of each, without travelling more than a mile. After this junction, the river continues a considerable distance to be still a foam ing mountain torrent. It then spreads into a broad and comparatively gentle stream full of islands. Precipitous peaks of blackish rock frown above the river in perpendicular elevations of 1,000 feet. The mountains, whose bases it sweeps, are covered with pines, cedars, and firs; and mountain sheep are seen bounding on their summits, where they are apparently inaccessible. In this distance the mountains have an aspect of inexpressible loneliness and grandeur.

The river then becomes almost a continued cataract for the distance of about 17 m. In this distance its perpendicular descent is 362 feet. The first fall is 98 feet; the second, 19; the third, 47; the fourth, 26. These falls are next to Niagara the grandest in the world. The river continues rapid for a long distance beyond. The Roche Jaune, or Yellow Stone, is probably the largest tributary of the Missouri. It rises in the same ranges of mountains with the main river, and has many points of resemblance to it. It enters from the south by a mouth 850 yards wide. It is a broad, deep, and sweeping river; and at its junction appears the larger of the two. Its course is commonly calculated at 1,600 miles. But the size and length of all these tributaries are probably over rated. Its shores, for a long distance above its entrance, are heavily timbered, and its bottoms wide, and of the finest soil. Its entrance is deemed to be 1,880 m. above the mouth of the Missouri; and it was selected by the government, as an eligible situation for a military post, and an extensive settlement. White bears, elk, and mountain sheep, are the principal animals seen along this part of the river. The other tributaries are the Kansas, Platte, Osage, Little Missouri, Running Water, White and Milk Rivers.

At the point of junction with the Yellow Stone, the Missouri has wide and fine bottoms. But its banks are for the most part destitute of timber, and this for a long series of years will prevent its being inhabited. The 'Gates of the Rocky Mountains,' through which the Missouri seems to have torn itself a passage, are commonly described as among the sublimest spectacles in the world. For nearly 6 m. these mountains rise in black and perpendicular masses 1,200 feet above the surface of the river. The chasm is little more than 250 yards wide; and the deep and foaming waters of the Missouri rush through the passage, as if it were a cataract. The heart of the beholder is chilled, as he contemplates, in these wild and uninhabited regions, this conflict between the river and the mountains. The smooth and black walls of the cleft rise more than twice as high as the mountains on the Hudson, below West Point. Every passenger up that river has been impressed with the grandeur of that scene in the midst of amenity and life. What then must be the sensations of the passenger through the gates of the Rocky Mountains, who witnesses the proofs of this conflict of nature, in a region three hundred leagues from civilization. Vast columns of the rock are torn from the mountains and lie along the banks of the river.

The bottoms of the Missouri have a character, very distinguishable from those of the Upper Mississippi. They are higher, not so wet, more sandy, with trees which are not so large, but taller and straighter. Its alluvions are something narrower; having for the first 500 m. a medial width of more than 4 m. Its bluffs, like those of the other river, are generally limestone, but not so perpendicular; and have more tendency to run into the mamelle form. The bottoms abound with deer, turkeys and small game. The river seldom overflows any part of its banks, in this distance. It is little inclined to be swampy. There are much fewer lakes, bayous, and small ponds, than along the Mississippi. Prairies are scarcely seen on the banks of the river, within the distance of the first 400 m. of its course. It is heavily timbered, and yet from the softness of the wood, easily cleared. The water, though uncommonly turbid with a whitish earth, which it holds in suspension, soon and easily settles, and is then remarkably pure, pleasant and healthy water. The river is so rapid and sweeping in its course, and its bed is composed of such masses of sand, that it is continually shifting its sandbars. A chart of the river, as it runs this year, gives little ground for calculation, in navigating it the next. It has numerous islands and generally near them is the most difficult to be stemmed.—Still more than the Mississippi below its mouth, it tears up in one place, and deposits in another; and makes more frequent and powerful changes in its channel, than any other western river.

Its bottoms are considerably settled for a distance of 400 m. above its mouth. That of Charaton is the highest compact settlement. But the largest and most populous settlement in the state is that called Boone's Lick. Indeed, there are American settlers, here and there, on the bottoms, above the Platte, and far beyond the limits of the state of Missouri. Above the Platte the open and prairie character of the country begins to develop. The prairies come quite into the banks of the river; and stretch from it indefinitely, in naked grass plains, where the traveller may wander for days, without seeing either wood or water.—The 'Council Bluffs' are an important military station, about 600 m. up the Missouri. Beyond this point commences a country of great interest and grandeur in many respects; and denominated, by way of eminence, the Upper Missouri. The country is composed of vast and almost boundless grass plains, through which stretch the Platte, the Yellow Stone, and the other rivers of this ocean of grass. The savages of this region have a peculiar physiognomy and mode of life. It is a country, where commence new tribes of plants. It is the home of buffaloes, elk, white bears, antelopes and mountain sheep. And its inexhaustible supplies of game make it the paradise of hunters. Sometimes the river washes the basis of the dark hills of a friable and crumbling soil. Here are found, as Lewis and Clarke, and other respectable travellers relate, large and singular petrifications, both animal and vegetable.—On the top of one of these hills they found the petrified skeleton of a huge fish, 45 feet in length

The herds of gregarious animals, particularly the buffaloes, are innumerable. Such is the general character of the country, until we come in contact with the spurs of the Rocky Mountains.

As far as the limits of the state, this river is capable of supporting a dense population, for a considerable distance from its banks. Above those limits it is generally too destitute of wood, to become habitable by any other people than hunters and shepherds. All the great tributaries of this river are copies, more or less exact, of the parent stream. One general remark applies to the whole country. The rivers have a narrow margin of fertility. The country, as it recedes from the river, becomes more and more sterile, sandy and destitute of water, until it approximates in character towards the sandy deserts of Arabia.

Missouri, one of the United States, lying west of the Mississippi, and intersected by the great river from which it takes its name. It is bounded N. and W. by the Territory of Missouri, E. by Illinois, Kentucky and Tennessee, and S. by Arkansas; extending from 36. to 40. 30. N. lat. and from 89. to 94. 10. W. long. 270 m. in length and 220 in breadth. It contains 60,000 sq. m. The Mississippi washes the eastern boundary, the other principal streams are the branches of the Missouri and this river. The Ozark Mountains extend south-westerly from this state into Arkansas, and there are some mountain ridges toward the east. A large extent of this great state in its south-east angle commencing above New Madrid, and extending down the great swamp, and through the alluvial region, a considerable distance back from the Mississippi, is low, swampy, full of lakes, and in many places subject to be inundated. Beyond that region, which is generally marked by a bold line of rolling and fertile high lands, the country gradually rises into high flint knobs, still rising beyond that region to the mountainous country of the lead mines. This country extends to the Osage and its tributaries. Beyond this the country is broken and hilly; until we open upon the boundless belt of open prairies, which spreads beyond the western limits of this state. The best portion, and the most inhabited parts of the state are between the Missouri and Mississippi. This vast tract is no where mountainous. It contains great tracts of alluvial and hilly prairies. It is for the most part a surface, delightfully rolling and variegated. There is no part of the globe, where greater extents of country can be traversed more easily, and in any direction by carriages of any description, where there are no roads, and that is yet in a state of nature.

One specific difference between the soil of this country, and the country bordering on the Ohio is, that the land here contains a much greater proportion of sand, is more loamy and friable, and the soil is not so stiff. There are tracts over all this country, where we find the clayey soils of Ohio and Kentucky. But they are small. The roads generally, run over tracts, where the falling rain and snow are so readily absorbed, even in the winter, that the people are not troubled with the deep and almost impassable roads, that we find in those states. The rich uplands are of a darkish grey colour; with the exception of the great tract about the lead mines, where the soil, composed of decomposed pyrite, is reddish, and of a colour brighter than Spanish brown. The poorer uplands are generally covered with white oak, and that small shrubby species of oak denominated here pin oak.

It is usually a stiffer and more clayey soil than the other; and it is of a light yellow colour. There are two extensive tracts of that fine kind of timbered upland alluvion, which constitutes the finest central portions of Kentucky. The one is, perhaps, fifteen or twenty miles in extent. It is south-west of the mine country, and is called Bellevue settlement. The other tract is much larger, and is called in this country the Boone's lick settlement. There are smaller extents of this kind of land, spread over all the state. In a state of nature, it strikes the eye delightfully. The surface rolls gently and almost imperceptibly. It has the same trees and shrubs, and the grand vegetation, that designate the rich alluvions; and at the same time it has the diversified surface, and the associated ideas of health, and springs of water that are naturally connected with the notion of uplands. These lands are timbered with the same trees which the alluvions bear. Like those, they are surmounted with grape vines, and are free from underbrush. The graceful pawpaw, the persimon, and the wild cherry tree, all denoting rich soils, abound in these regions; and they are nearly as fertile as the bottoms of the Missouri, or the Mississippi.

The prairies are generally level and of an intermediate character between the richer and the poorer uplands. The alluvial prairies are universally rich, and nearly as fertile as the bottoms. Some tracts of the upland prairies are rich. But there are scarcely any lands in this state sufficiently level for cultivation, that have not fertility enough to bring good crops of corn without manure; and in many instances the poorer lands are better for wheat than the richer. The grandest objects of nature will, probably, not excite so much surprise in the mind of a traveller from the Atlantic states, as the first view of a prairie. Riding, day after day, through forests, where the small improvements made in the wilderness scarcely interrupt the general aspect of woods, he opens at once upon the view of a boundless horizon. In the early periods of summer, he beholds outstretched under his eye a perfectly level plain, of the most soft and beautiful verdure, covered with a thousand flowers of every agent and hue. Here and there, in the skirts of the prairies, and often in their centre are clumps of oaks, and pecans and black walnuts, disposed in forms so regular, and generally circular, as could not fail to delight the eye of an admirer of the ancient style of gardening. He is unprepared for such a view, seen in such strong contrast with dark and lonely forests. It is, after all, impossible to convey by description the impression, which these views create. In these vast and beautiful prairies, or on the verge of the bluffs, that overlook them he beholds at once a verdant and sleeping ocean of grass, vast rivers rolling their mighty masses of waters through the dark forests, romantic hills stretching away in the distance, and here and there a cabin or a house throwing up its column of smoke, and the cattle, horses and sheep sleeping about it. A grander spectacle is exhibited when in the autumn the Indians set fire to the dry grass. The flames leap forward with astonishing rapidity and spread in all directions. The hunter or the traveller is unable to escape by their utmost speed and the wild horses, deer and buffaloes are often overtaken and burnt to death.

The lead mines of this state are highly productive. They are connected with that great mineral tract which extends from the N. W. part of Illinois into the adjacent territories, and which the reader will find described under the head of Lead Mines. The richest mines in this state are in the neighbourhood of Potosi, upon Big river, a small stream flowing into the Maramec. The ore is found not in veins, but in detached masses from 2 to 20 feet below the surface. About 3,000,000 pounds are annually smelted. Coal is found in abundance along the Missouri, and iron in every part of the state. Manganese, zinc, antimony, and cobalt accompany the lead ore; salt, nitre, soapstone, plumbago, barytes, pumice stone, gypsum, flint and marble are also produced here.

The climate is generally salubrious, and the air uncommonly dry; but the weather is subjected to greater extremes of cold and heat than in the other western states. Wheat and maize are the staple articles of cultivation; flax, hemp and cotton are also raised.

Missouri is divided into 33 counties. The population is 140,074, of whom 24,900 are slaves. The capital is Jefferson, the largest town is St. Louis. The legislature is called the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The senators are chosen for 4 years and the representatives for 2. The Governor is chosen for 4 years and is ineligible for the next term. Elections are popular and suffrage is universal. The Baptists have 67 ministers in this state; the Methodists 23; the Presbyterians 10; the Episcopalians 3, and there are some Catholics. There is a college at St. Louis and a few seminaries of learning exist in other parts.

This state was originally a part of the Territory of Louisiana. It was admitted into the Union in 1821.

Missouri Territory, the name given to that vast extent of wild country belonging to the United States which lies west of all the settled districts and east of the Rocky Mountains. It is bounded N. by the British possessions, E. by Michigan, Illinois, and the state of Missouri, S. and S. W. by Mexico and W. by the Rocky Mountains. It extends from 36. 30. to 49. N. lat. and from 90. to 112. W. long. and is estimated to contain 800,000 sq. miles. A great part of this immense territory is intersected by the river Missouri and its numerous branches. The north-western part is traversed by a mountain ridge which branches from the great Rocky Mountain chain, about the 42d degree of latitude, and extends north-westerly towards Lake Winnipeg. The eastern part is a level country. From 200 to 400 miles west of the Mississippi, the land is partly covered with forests. Beyond this limit commences a vast ocean of prairies, and the country is mostly a plain in some parts fertile and covered with grass, and in others a barren desert of sand.

The surface and soil of this vast extent of country is different from any other of the same dimensions on the globe. The lower courses of all the rivers, that enter the Mississippi from this region, are wooded. In proportion, as we ascend towards the mountains, the wood becomes more scarce, and the upper tributaries of these streams run through open prairies. There is, also, a fertile belt along the banks of all these streams; but in proportion as we diverge from them, the land becomes more sterile and parched. We sometimes may travel whole days, without seeing water. Great portions of this country may be almost likened to the Sahara of the African deserts. There is, however, in the most sterile parts a thin sward of grass and herbage. Countless droves of buffaloes, elk and deer, range upon these vast prairies. These will probably, in some future period of our national existence be replaced by herds of domestic cattle, and flocks of sheep, followed by moving bands of shepherds. Almost the whole course of the Missouri, Platte and Yellow Stone are through a rich soil. The same may be affirmed of Red river. The upper courses of the Arkansas are through the most sterile region of this ocean of prairies.

In a country of such immense extent, generally level, naked and open, the climate must of course in a great measure correspond to the latitude. The first climate, beyond the state of Missouri, and the territory of Arkansas, is mild and temperate. The belt beyond has nearly the climate of New England. Still further towards the mountains, it is Canadian. Pike and other travellers speak of encountering storms of sleet and hail in the summer, near the sources of the Arkansas. When the winds blow from the west over the summits of these mountains, the cold they occasion is extreme.

Wild horses are abundant in various parts of this country. Lewis and Clarke in their expedition saw many of them on the plains of the Missouri, and Major Long observed whole troops upon the prairies still farther south. The Indians are abundantly supplied with them, many of which are very fleet, and capable of great endurance. A savage warrior mounted on one of these with his long spear, makes a very formidable appearance.

The Indians take no pains to breed horses, but supply themselves by catching and taming as many as they want. A method sometimes adopted by hunters for taking the wild horse, is to shoot the animal through the neck, using the requisite care not to injure the spine. A horse may receive a rifle ball through a particular part of the neck, without sustaining any permanent injury, the blow, is however, sufficient to occasion a temporary suspension of the powers of life, during which, the animal is easily taken. This is called crossing; and requires for its successful performance, no small degree of skill in the use of the rifle.

Major Long remarks, that in the habits of the wild horse, we find little unlike what is seen in the domestic animal. He becomes the most timorous and watchful of the inhabitants of the wilderness. It would appear from the paths that are seen, that they sometimes perform long journeys.

Wild horses were once numerous on the Kootanny Lands, near the northern sources of the Columbia, on the eastern side of the Rocky Mountain Ridge, but of late years they have been almost eradicated in that quarter. They are not known to exist in a wild state to the northward of the fifty-second or fifty-third parallel of latitude. The Kootannies are acquainted with the Spanish and American mode of taking them with the lazo. Major Long mentions that horses are an object of particular value to the Osages. For the purpose of obtaining these animals, which in their wild state preserve all their fleetness, they go in a large party to the country of the Red Canadian River, where they are to be found in considerable numbers. When they discover a gang of the horses, they distribute themselves into three parties, two of which take their stations at different and proper distances on their route, which by previous experience they know the horses will most probably take when endeavouring to escape. This arrangement being completed, the first party commences the pursuit in the direction of their colleagues, at whose position they at length arrive. The second party then continues the chase with fresh horses, and pursues the fugitives to the third party, which generally succeeds in so far running them down, as to noose and capture a considerable number of them.

Immense herds of bison, elks, deer, and other wild animals occupy these vast plains. Of these the bison is the most remarkable from the incredible numbers in which they feed together. Sometimes 40 sq. m. of territory have been seen completely covered with them. At the period when the Europeans began to make settlements in North America, this animal was occasionally met with on the Atlantic coast; but even then it appears to have been rare to the eastward of the Appalachian Mountains; for Lawson has thought it to be a fact worth recording, that two were killed in one season on Cape Fear River. As early as the first discovery of Canada it was unknown in that country. Theodat, whose history of Canada was published in 1636, merely says, that he was informed that bulls existed in the remote western countries. Warden mentions that at no very distant date, herds of them existed in the western part of Pennsylvania, and that as late as the year 1766 they were pretty numerous in Kentucky. The bisons wander constantly from place to place either from being disturbed by hunters, or in quest of food. They are much attracted by the soft tender grass, which springs up after a fire has spread over the prairie. In winter they scrape away the snow with their feet, to reach the grass. The bulls and cows live in separate herds for the greater part of the year; but at all seasons, one or two bulls generally accompany a large herd of cows. The bison is in general a shy animal, and takes to flight instantly on winding an enemy, which the acuteness of its sense of smell enables it to do from a great distance. They are less wary when they are assembled together in numbers, and will then often blindly follow their leaders, regardless of, or trampling down the hunters posted in their way. It is dangerous for the hunter to show himself after having wounded one, for it will pursue him, and although its gait may be heavy and awkward, it will have no difficulty in overtaking the fleetest runner. While feeding, they are often scattered over a great extent of country, but when they move in a mass, they form a dense and almost impenetrable column, which once in motion, is scarcely to be impeded. Their line of march is seldom interrupted even by considerable rivers, across which they swim without fear or hesitation, nearly in the order that they traverse the plains. When flying before their pursuers, it would be in vain for the foremost to halt, or attempt to obstruct the progress of the main body, as the throng in the rear still rushes onward, the leaders must advance, although destruction awaits the movement. The Indians take advantage of this circumstance to destroy great quantities of this favourite game, and certainly no mode could be resorted to more effectually destructive, nor could a more terrible devastation be produced, than that of forcing a numerous herd of these large animals, to leap together from the brink of a dreadful precipice, upon a rocky and broken surface, a hundred feet below.

When the Indians determine to destroy bisons in this way, one of their swiftest footed and most active young men is selected, who is disguised in a bison skin, having the head, ears, and horns adjusted on his own head, so as to make the deception very complete, and thus accoutred, he stations himself between the bison herd and some of the precipices that often extend for several miles along the rivers. The Indians surround the herd as nearly as possible, when at a given signal, they show themselves and rush forward with loud yells. The animals being alarmed, and seeing no way open but in the direction of the disguised Indian, runs towards him, and he taking to flight dashes on to the precipice, where he suddenly secures himself in some previously ascertained crevice. The foremost of the herd arrives at the brink—there is no possibility of retreat, no chance of escape; the foremost may for an instant shrink with terror, but the crowd behind, who are terrified by the approaching hunters, rush forward with increasing impetuosity, and the aggregated force hurls them successively into the gulf where certain death awaits them.

The grizzly bear is a native of this territory and is the most ferocious of all his tribe. He is twice as large as the black bear, with enormously large paws and teeth. He is the monarch of the Rocky Mountains as the lion is of the deserts of Africa. The Indians regard him with the utmost terror.

His enormous strength enables him to kill and drag away a bison, whom he buries in a pit dug for the purpose. His extreme tenacity of life renders him still more dangerous; for he can endure repeated wounds which would be instantaneously mortal to other beasts, and in that state, can rapidly pursue his enemy. So that the hunter who fails to shoot him through the brain, is placed in the most perilous situation.

One evening the men in the hindmost of one of Lewis and Clark's canoes perceived one of these bears lying in the open ground about three hundred paces from the river; and six of them, who were all good hunters, went to attack him. Concealing themselves by a small eminence, they were able to approach within 40 paces unperceived; four of the hunters now fired, and each lodged a ball in his body, two of which passed directly through the lungs. The bear sprang up and ran furiously with open mouth upon them; two of the hunters, who had reserved their fire, gave him two additional wounds, and one breaking his shoulder-blade, somewhat retarded his motion. Before they could again load their guns, he came so close on them, that they were obliged to run towards the river, and before they had gained it the bear had almost overtaken them. Two men jumped into the canoe; the other four separated and concealing themselves among the willows, fired as fast as they could load their pieces. Several times the bear was struck, but each shot seemed only to direct his fury towards the hunter; at last, he pursued them so closely that they threw aside their guns and pouches, and jumped from a perpendicular bank, 20 feet high, into the river. The bear sprang after them, and was very near the hindmost man, when one of the hunters on the shore shot him through the head, and finally killed him. When they dragged him on shore, they found that 8 balls had passed through his body in different directions. On one occasion Capt. Lewis was walking at some distance from the river when a huge bear sprang suddenly upon him. He had no resource but flight, and plunging into the river, he hoped thus to escape, but the bear pursued him in the water, and would not give up the pursuit, until Capt. Lewis turned round and threatened him with a spear which he had in his hand. He then thought it best to return, and fled into the thicket.

This territory is inhabited by various Indian tribes, the most numerous of which are the Sioux. The whole number of the Indians is estimated at 150,000. The United States have military posts in different parts. It constituted a portion of the great territory of Louisiana purchased of the French.

Missouri, towns in Clark and Hempstead Cos Arkansas.

Missouriton, a town in Howard Co. Missouri.

Mistaken Cape, the S. point of the eastern-most of the Hermit Islands, about 9 m. E. N. E. of Cape Horn.

Mistaken Point, a promontory on the W. of Cape Race, at the S. E. point of the island of Newfoundland.

Mistassin, Lake, a lake of New Britain, lying E. of the S. part of James' Bay, and surrounded by mountains called the Great Mistassins. It is above 250 m. in circuit, of a very irregular shape, being much intersected by long and narrow projections of land, and contains several islands. It is formed of the Mistassin and other rivers from the mountains, and its outlet is the river Rupert.

Mistretta, a town of Sicily, in Val di Demona, 50 m. E. S. E. of Palermo.

Mitcham, a village in Surrey, Eng. 7 m. S. W. of London. It is seated on the Wandle, on which are some snuff-mills and calico-printing manufactories.

Mitcheldean, a town in Gloucestershire, Eng. seated at the N. extremity of the forest of Dean, 12 m. W. of Gloucester and 116 W. by N. of London.

Mitchelstown, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, with a college for 12 decayed gentlemen and 16 gentlewomen. It is 23 m. N. E. of Cork and 26 S. S. E. of Limerick.

Mittau, a town of Russia, capital of the government of Courland, the residence of Louis XVIII for several years during his exile. The walls and moats of the town are decayed, the houses, for the most part, have no particular elegance; and a great many gardens and open places are contained within its circuit. Here are two Lutheran churches, a beautiful Calvinist church, and a Catholic church. It is seated on the Aa, 45 m. E. of Goldingen and 270 N. N. E. of Warsaw. Long. 23. 56. E., lat. 56. 40. N.

Mittenwald, a town of Siberia, on the Neisse, 18 m. S. of Glatz.

Mittenwald, a town of Bavaria, capital of the county of Werdenfels; seated on the Iser, 12 m. N. of Innsbruck.

Mitterburg, a town of Austrian Illyria, with a castle on a rock, 30 m. S. E. of Trieste.

Mobile, p.t. Mobile Co. Alabama, and the only considerable town in the state. It stands on the W. side of a large bay to which it gives its name, and has a good trade principally in the exportation of cotton. Steam-boats ply between this place and New Orleans, as well as the towns on the river above Mobile. This town was founded by the Spaniards about the year 1700. The yellow fever is often prevalent here. Lat. 30. 37. N. long. 86. 18. W. Pop. 3,194.

Mobile, a river of Alabama, formed by the junction of the Alabama and Tombectbee, 40 m. above the town of Mobile. It enters Mobile Bay by several channels. The western channel is called the Mobile; the eastern is called the Tensaw, and has the greatest width and depth. Mobile Bay is 30 m. long and 12 broad; it has two entrances from the Gulf of Mexico, the deepest of which is 18 feet of water.

Mobile, a county of Alabama. Pop. 6,265. Mobile is the capital.

Mocaranga, or Mocara, a kingdom on the E. coast of Africa, erroneously called Monomotapa, which is the title of the monarch. It is bounded on the N. by Monomugi, E. by the Mosambique, S. by Sofala and Manica, and W. by unknown regions. It has several rivers, of which the Zambeza is the chief; is fertile in rice, millet, and sugar-canes, which last grow without cultivation; and the pastures feed vast multitudes of cattle, especially of the largest sorts, but not any horses. There are a great many ostriches, wild beasts, and elephants; and several mines of gold and silver. The natives possess all the characteristics of the African negro. Their houses are built of wood, and covered with plaster; but they have few towns. Madroga is the capital.

Mocampour, or Mockwanpore, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name subject to the rajah of Nepal. It is situated on the E. side of the Nepal, 48 m. S. S. E. of Catmandu and 136 N. of Patna. Long. 85. 20. E., lat. 27. 30. N.

Mocha, or Moka, a town of Arabia, in Yemen, seated on a small bay of the Red Sea, near the strait of Babelmandel. On each of the points of land, which enclose the road, is a fort; but they are wretched structures. The town is of a circular form, surrounded by a wall in which are six gates. It stands in a dreary plain, bounded by mountains, and consisting entirely of arid sand. The English, from Hindoostan, at present engross almost exclusively the trade of this place, which is very considerable, especially in coffee. 140 m. S. S. W. of Sana and 638 S. S. E. of Mecca. Long. 44. 25. E., lat. 13. 10. N.

Modbury, a town in Devonshire, Eng. with a manufacture of plush. It has a spacious church and two meeting-houses, and is seated between two hills, 36 m. S. S. W. of Exeter and 288 W. S. W. of London.

Modena, or Modenese, a duchy of Italy, bounded on the W. by Parma, N. by the Po, E. by the papal states, and S. by the Apennines. It now includes the principalities of Massa and Carrara, and contains an area of 2,060 sq. m. with 370,000 inhabitants. The soil is fertile in corn, wine, oil, and fruits of different kinds. It also feeds a great number of cattle.

Modena, the capital of the Modenese, and a bishop's see, with a citadel and a magnificent college. The cathedral, several of the churches, and some of the monasteries, are handsome structures. The ducal palace is richly furnished and contains fine paintings. The inhabitants of Modena, estimated at 30,000 carry on manufactures of hemp, woollens, glass, leather, &c. It is seated between the rivers Secchia and Panaro, 30 m. E. S. E. of Parma and 60 N. N. W. of Florence. Long. 11. 12. E., lat. 44. 34. N.

Modica, a town of Sicily, in Val di Noto, capital of a district of its name; seated near the river Scicli, 10 m. W. of Noto.

Modon, a strong town of the Morea, and a bishop's see, with a safe harbour. It is seated on a promontory, projecting into the sea of Sapienza, 15 m. W. of Coron. Long. 21. 31. E., lat. 36. 53. N.

Moers. See Mours.

Mooskirch, a town of Bavaria, 18 m. N. of Constance.

Moffat, a town of Scotland, in Dumfries-shire, near the river Annan, encompassed on all sides, except the S. by hills of different heights. Its delightful situation and its mineral springs attract much company. 20 m. N. by E. of Dumfries and 50 S. of Edinburgh.

Moffat Hills, the highest mountains of the S. of Scotland, on the N. border of Dumfries-shire. Hartfell, the most elevated, is 2,300 feet above the level of the sea. They feed numerous flocks of sheep; and from them descend, in different directions, the Tweed, Clyde, and Annan, whose sources are but little distant from each other.

Mogador, a town of the empire of Morocco, with a harbour for vessels of a middling size. It is the emporium of all the foreign, and indeed of the entire trade of Morocco, and contains 10,000 inhabitants. The town is surrounded by walls, with batteries, and at high tides is almost encompassed by the sea. The streets are all in straight lines and contain a great number of handsome houses. The port is formed by a channel, between the mainland and an island above a mile in length. It is 180 m. W. N. W. of Morocco. Long. 9. 35. W., lat. 31. 28. N.

Mohats, a town of Lower Hungary, in the county of Buraay. Here Louis, the last king of Hungary, was defeated in 1526, by the Turks under Soliman II., with the loss of 22,000 men, and after the battle was suffocated by the fall of his horse in a muddy brook. In 1687 the Turks were defeated by prince Charles of Lorraine, with the loss of 10,000 men, their cannon, and baggage. It is seated at the conflux of the Corasse with the Danube, 23 m. N. by E. of Esseck.

Mohawk River, a river of New York, which rises 40 m. E. of Lake Ontario, and, after receiving many tributary streams, enters Hudson River, 10 m. above Albany. About 3 m. above its junction with the Hudson it has a cataract, where the stream, 100 yards wide, falls perpendicularly about 70 feet.

Mohawk, a village on the Ouse or Grand river, U.C., and the principal settlement of the Six Nations of Indians.

Mohegan, a village of New London Co. Conn. on the Thames, 5 m. below Norwich. It is inhabited by a remnant of the Mohegan Indians.

Mohila, one of the Comoro Islands, between the N. end of Madagascar and the continent of Africa. The inland parts are mountainous and woody. Some of the inhabitants are Mahomedans, who have a few wretched mosques, built of wood and straw without, and matted neatly within. This island produces plenty of rice, peas, honey, cocoa-nuts, plantains, various fruits and sugar-canes. It has a good road for ships. Long. 43. 59. E., lat. 12. 35. S.

Mohilef, or Megilef, a considerable government of the Russian empire, to the E. of the government of Minak. Its area is 18,500 sq. m., and its pop. about 800,000, of whom the majority are Poles.

Mohilef, the capital of the above government, is the seat of the government officers, and the residence of a Greek and a Catholic archbishop, and has a castle, surrounded with an earthen mound. The inhabitants carry on a considerable trade with Dantzic, Riga, and Memel. In July, 1822, a severe battle was fought in the neighbourhood of this place between the French and the Russians. It is situate on the Dnieper, 340 m. E. N. E. of Warsaw and 364 S. of Petersburg. Long. 30. 14. E., lat. 53. 52. N.

Mokrin, a town of Prussia, in Brandenburg, 18 m. N. N. W. of Custrin.

Mohrungen, a town of Prussia, in the government of Königsberg, situate on a lake of the same name, which almost surrounds it. Here is an old castle, formerly a convent, belonging to the knights of the Teutonic order, in consequence of whose wars the town has frequently suffered. It is 56 m. S. S. W. of Königsberg and 56 S. E. of Dantzic.

Molihah, a town and fort of Arabia Petrea, on the coast of the Red Sea, 130 m. S. of Acaba and 180 N. W. of Medina. Long. 33. 50. E., lat. 27. 30. N.

Molina, a strong town of Spain, in New Castile, seated on a river of the same name, in a territory abounding in pastures, 108 m. E. N. E. of Madrid.

Molise, a province of Naples, in the form of a triangle, whose sides are 39 m. long, lying between Terra di Lavoro, Abruzzo Citra, Capitanata, and Principato Ultra. It is a mountainous country, but fertile in corn, wine, saffron, and silk. It suffered much damage by an earthquake in 1805, when upwards of 20,000 of the inhabitants perished.

Molise, the capital of the foregoing province, with a castle. 50 m. N. N. E. of Naples. Long. 14. 43. E., lat. 41. 36. N.

Mollen, a strong town of Denmark, in the duchy of Lauenburg, seated on the Steckenitz, 8 m. S. of Lubeck.

Molsheim, a town of France, department of Lower Rhine, seated on the Brusch, 10 m. W. of Strasburg.

Moluccas, or Spice Islands, a number of islands in the Indian Ocean, lying E. of Celebes. They include those from Mortay in the N. to Banda in the S., and from Mysol in the E. to Bouru in the W. The other principal ones are Gilolo, Ceram, Amboyna, Ouby, Ternate, Tidore, Motir, Machian, and Bachian. Except Gilolo, they produce neither corn, rice, nor cattle, but they have oranges, lemons, and other fruits; and are most remarkable for spices, especially cloves and nutmegs. On the shores there are large rocks of coral, of great variety and beauty.

The clove tree, (now called by botanists Eugenia caryophyllata), is about forty or fifty feet high, with long pointed leaves like those of the laurel. Some compare its appearance to that of the beech. At the beginning of the wet season in May, it throws out a profusion of leaves. Soon after, the germs of the fruit are to be seen at the extremities of the shoots, and in four months the cloves are fully formed. The fruit, at first of a green colour, assumes in time a pale yellow, and then a blood red. At this period, it is fit to be used as a spice, consequently this is the clove harvest. But to open sufficiently for the purposes of propagation, it requires three weeks longer; in which period it swells to an extraordinary size, loses much of its spicy quality, and contains a hard nucleus like the seed of the bay. It is now called "the Mother Clove." There are five varieties of this fruit. It has a more limited geographical distribution than any other useful plant. It was originally confined to the five Molucca islands, and chiefly to Makian. It had been conveyed to Amboyna a very short time before the arrival of the Portuguese. Not partial to large islands, it does not grow well in Gilolo, Ceram, Booro, or Celebes. It has been cultivated, and has produced fruit, in the western part of Oceanica. It has also borne fruit, though of inferior quality, for these fifty years in the Mauritius. Even at Amboyna, the tree is not productive before the tenth or twelfth year of its growth, and requires great attention whereas, in the parent islands, it bears in its seventh or eighth year, and requires very little care or culture. It neither thrives near the sea nor on the high hills. The gathering, the drying, and the packing of it, are all as simple operations as possible; and very little care is required for its preservation as an article of commerce.

The most remarkable animals in these islands are the barbiroussa, the opossum, the phalanger, the Indian jerboa, and the chevrotain or Moschus pygmaeus. There are but few domestic animals. The eye is delighted with the magnificent plumage of some of the birds, such as the bird of para dise, the fishing martin, the different parrots, cockatoos, and others. We know little of the minerals of these regions.

The natives of the Moluccas, before they were visited by foreign nations, attached no value to the vegetable riches which are peculiar to their islands, and which have rendered them at once so celebrated and so unfortunate. The Chinese first accidentally landed in the middle age, and discovered the clove and the nutmeg, in consequence of which a taste for these commodities was diffused over India, and thence extended to Persia and to Europe. These islands were discovered in 1511, by the Portuguese, who formed some settlements; but were driven out in 1607 by the Dutch, to whom the islands are at present subject.

Molwitz, a town of Prussian Silesia, in the principality of Brieg, famous for a victory gained by the Prussians over the Austrians in 1741. 4 m. W. of Brieg.

Mombaza, a city on the coast of Zanguebar. It was seated on a peninsula, which has been since turned into an island, by cutting a canal through the isthmus. It is defended by a strong citadel, has a commodious harbour for large vessels, and carries on a great commerce with the islands and kingdoms adjacent, in gold, ivory, rice, flesh, &c. The king of Melinda, being a Christian, had a quarrel with the Portuguese governor, took the castle by assault, turned Mahomedan, and murdered all the Christians, in 1631. In 1729 the Portuguese again became masters of this territory; but since that time the natives have regained possession of it, and have treated in the most treacherous and hostile manner all Christians who have attempted to land. Mombaza is 75 m. S. S. W. of Melinda. Long. 39. 30. E., lat. 3. 15. S.

Monacks, p.v. Montgomery Co. Alabama.

Monaco, a fortified sea-port of Italy, capital of a small principality of the same name, between the country of Nice and the duchy of Genoa. The harbour is good, but not deep enough for large vessels; the principal export is olive oil. It is seated on a craggy rock that projects into the sea, 12 m. E. N. E. of Nice. Long. 7. 30. E., lat. 43. 44. N.

Monaghan, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded N. by Tyrone, E. by Armagh, S. E. by Louth, S. W. by Cavan, and W. by Fermanagh. Its area includes 179,600 Irish acres, part of which is occupied by woods and bogs, and a third part taken up by Lough Erne. A great part is, however, in a high state of cultivation, and the population amounts to about 180,000. It contains five baronies, is divided into 20 parishes, and sends two members to parliament.

Monaghan, the capital of the foregoing county, was fortified with a castle and a fort, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. It is 40 m. S. W. of Belfast and 60 N. N. W. of Dublin. Long. 6. 49. W., lat. 54. 16. N.

Monaghan, a township of York Co. Pa.

Monaster, a town of the kingdom of Tunis, seated near the sea. 70 m. S. E. of Tunis. Long. 11. 6. E., lat. 35. 50. N.

Mongaon, a town of Portugal, in Entre Douro e Minho, with a strong castle; seated near the Minho, 24 m. N. of Braga.

Monchabon, a city of Birmah, and during a short period its capital, is surrounded by a wall and ditch, but is chiefly celebrated as the birth-place of Alompra, who afterwards became the deliverer of his country and the conqueror of Pegu. It is 40 m. N. of Ummerapoora.

Moncon, a town of Spain, in Arragon, with a castle, 6 m. S. of Balbastro and 50 N. E. of Saragossa.

Moncontour, a town of France, department of Cotes du Nord, 12 m. S. S. E. of St. Brieux.

Monadnock, mountain, usually called the Grand Monadnock, is situated in the towns of Jaffrey and Dublin, in Cheshire Co. N. H. about 22 m. E. from Connecticut river, and 10 N. of the Southern boundary of this state. The direction of the ridge is N. E. and S. W. The mountain is about 5 m. long from N. to S. and 3 m. from E. to W. According to Professor Dana, who visited the mountain in 1816, its base is 1,452, and its summit 3,450 feet above the level of the sea. The mountain is composed of talc, and mica slate, distinctly stratified. Garnet, schorl, feldspar, and quartz, occur in various parts. On the E. side, plumbago is found in large quantities. Crucibles and pencils have been manufactured from it, but for the latter, it proves not very good. The summit when seen at a distance of 4 or 5 m. appears rounded and destitute of those high cliffs and mural precipices belonging to granitic mountains. The prospect from the pinnacle is very extensive; thirty ponds of fresh water, some of which are so large as to contain islands of 8 or 10 acres, may be seen from it, in the immediate vicinity. Near the base of the mountain, is the "Monadnock Mineral Spring."

Moncontour, a town of France, department of Vienne, 27 m. N. W. of Poitiers.

Mondego, a river of Portugal, which has its source near Guardo, crosses Beira by Coimbra, and enters the Atlantic, near a cape of the same name. Its banks were the theatre of great military movements between the French and British in 1810 and 1811.

Mondonedo, a town of Spain, in Galicia, and a bishop's see; 60 m. N. E. of Compostella and 115 N. W. of Leon. Long. 7. 10. W., lat. 43. 30. N.

Mondovi, a fortified town of Piedmont, capital of a province of its name and a bishop's see. In 1796 the French gained a victory here over the Austrians, which made them masters of the states of the king of Sardinia. It is seated on a mountain, near the river Ellero, 14 m. E. of Coni. Long. 8. 3. E., lat. 44. 25. N.

Mondragon, a town of Spain, in Guipuscoa, near which are some medicinal springs and a famous mine of excellent iron. It is seated on the Deva, 24 m. S. S. W. of St. Sebastian.

Mondragone, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, celebrated for its medicinal waters. 13 m. N. W. of Capua.

Monforte, a town of Portugal, in Tras os Montes, 30 m. W. of Braganza.

Monghyr, a celebrated town and fortress of Hindoostan, capital of a district of its name in the province of Bahar, seated on the S. bank of the Ganges, which in the rainy season forms here a prodigious expanse of fresh water. The town, as distinct from the fortress, consists of 16 different bazaars, or market-places, scattered over a space of about a mile and a half long and a mile wide. The population is estimated at 30,000. Since 1816 this has formed one of the stations of the Baptist Missionary Society, whose exertions have here been attended with a pleasing degree of success. 80 m. E. by S. of Patna and 300 N. W. of Calcutta. Long. 86. 36. E., lat. 25. 24. N.

Mongolia, or Western Chinese Tartary, is bounded on the N. by Siberia, E. by Eastern Tartary, S. by the Great Wall of China and Leatong, and W. by Independent Tartary, and occupying most of the space between China and Asiatic Russia. Almost the whole territory consists of a level plain, which borders on the Altai and other mountain chains that form the Russian frontier. The inhabitants are decidedly distinguished both from the Turks and Tartars. They have neither towns nor houses; but wander in hordes, and live under tents, which they remove from one place to another, according as the temperature of the different seasons, or the wants of their flocks, require. They pass the summer on the banks of rivers, and the winter at the foot of some mountain or hill which shelters them from the piercing N. wind. Their ideas of honour, perhaps less ridiculous than those of our contemporaries, induce them rather to be content with the food which their flocks supply them, than cultivate the earth. During the summer they live only on milk, using without distinction that of the cow, mare, ewe goat, and camel. Their ordinary drink is warm water, in which a little coarse tea has been infused; with this they mix cream, milk, or butter, according to their circumstances. They have also a method of making a kind of spirituous liquor of sour milk, especially of that of the mare. The Monguls are free, open, and sincere. They pride themselves chiefly on their dexterity in handling the bow and arrow, mounting on horseback, and hunting wild beasts. Polygamy is permitted among them; but they generally have only one wife. Their religion is confined to the worship of Fo. They have the most superstitious veneration for their lamas, to whom they give the most valuable of their effects in return for prayers, which they go about reciting from tent to tent. The Monguls are now split into a number of petty states, dependant on the empires of Russia and China. Those under the Chinese government may be divided into four principal tribes, which are the Monguls, properly so called, the Kalkas, the Ortous, and the Tartars of Konkonor.

Monheim, a town of Bavaria, in Neuburg, 8 m. N. of Donawert.

Monikendam, a sea-port of the Netherlands, in N. Holland, with manufactures of soap and silk; seated on an arm of the Zuider Zee, 8 m. N. E. of Amsterdam. Long. 4. 38. E., lat. 52. 29. N.

Monmouth, p.t. Kennebec Co. Me. 17 m. W. Augusta. Pop. 1,882.

Monmouth, a borough of England, capital of Monmouthshire. It was formerly defended by a wall and ditch; and contains the ruins of a castle in which the warlike Henry V. was born, hence called Henry of Monmouth. His cradle and the armour which he wore at the battle of Agincourt are still shown at Troy House, the seat of the duke of Beaufort, about half a mile from the town. Here are two ancient churches, both curious structures. The inhabitants carry on some trade by means of the Wye, and there are iron and tin works in the neighbourhood. Monmouth is seated at the conflux of the Wye and Minour, 25 m. W. of Gloucester and 131 W. by N. of London.

Monmouthshire, a county of England, 24 m. long and 20 broad. The eastern, and largest part, is a tract fertile in corn and pasture, well wooded, and abounding with limestone. The western portion is mountainous, and in great part unfavourable for cultivation; whence it is devoted to the feeding of sheep and goats. Monmouthshire was formerly reckoned one of the counties of Wales; and from the names of its towns and villages, its mountainous rugged surface, and its situation beyond the Wye, which seems to form a natural boundary between England and Wales in this part, it certainly partakes most of the character of the latter country though now comprehended in the civil division of the former. The higher ranks generally speak English, but the common people use the Welsh language. The chief wealth of the county arises from its agricultural and mineral products. During the last century a great number of iron works have been established, and some tin works; and the inland intercourse has been greatly facilitated by the Brecknock and Monmouthshire canals, as also by the several railways.

Monomotapa. See Mocavanga.

Monongahela, a river of the United States, which rises in Virginia, at the foot of the Laurel Mountains, flows N. by Morgantown, where it becomes navigable, then enters Pennsylvania, and passes by Redstone to Pittsburg, where it meets the Alleghany, and their united streams assume the name of Ohio.

Montgomery, a borough of Wales, capital of Montgomeryshire. Here are the ruins of a castle which was destroyed in the civil wars. Of late years the town has received considerable improvements; the market-house has been enlarged, and a new county gaol erected; many of the buildings are large and handsome. It stands on the side of a hill, at a short distance from the Severn, 168 m. N. W. of London.

Montgomeryshire, a county of Wales, 36 m. long and 34 broad. Though barren and mountainous in many parts, it has a greater mixture of fertile vale and plain than several of the Welsh counties. Its riches proceed from its sheep and wool, the hilly tract being almost entirely sheep-walks; and the flocks, like those of Spain, are driven from distant parts to feed on them during the summer. This county also affords mineral treasures, particularly lead; and it abounds with slate and lime; but there is no coal. Its principal rivers are the Plynlimmon, Severn, Vyrnew, and Tannat, all of which are noted for affording a variety of fish, particularly salmon.

Montreal, a fertile island and county of Lower Canada, in the river St. Lawrence, 30 m. long and 10 broad; surrendered by the French to the English in 1760.

Montreal, city, stands on the eastern side of the above island. It makes a fine appearance from a distance with its compact mass of buildings, roofed with sheets of tin, and overtopped by church spires glittering with the same metal. Behind it rises a mountain spotted with orchards. The houses are mostly of stone, or plastered to resemble it, and are low with a heavy look; the streets are narrow. The cathedral is the largest church in North America except that of Mexico; it is 265 feet long and 134 wide and is capable of containing 10,000 people. The college is a large edifice of stone, and has 300 students. The General Hospital or Convent of the Grey Sisters was established in 1753 and is under the management of a Superior and 19 Nuns. The other objects worthy of notice are Nelson's Monument, the Museum, and the Parade, a beautiful public ground. This city is the principal depot of the Northwestern Fur Company, and carries on a large trade with the United States. A rapid in the river below, is a great impediment to the commerce with Quebec. Montreal was taken from the French by the English under General Amherst in 1790. In 1775 it was taken by the Americans under General Montgomery, but shortly after abandoned. It is 120 m. S. W. of Quebec, 220 N. by W. of Boston. Lat. 45. 31. N. Long. 73. 35. W. Pop. in 1825, 24,000.

With Austrian Silesia, now annexed to it, its area is upwards of 10,000 sq. m. and its population 1,680,000. It is intersected by mountain ranges, but the most lofty ridges are diversified with fertile valleys and extensive plains, and it is watered by a great number of rivers and brooks. More corn is grown than the inhabitants consume, and much hemp and flax are raised. The principal manufactures are woollens, linen, cotton, iron, glass, paper, and gunpowder. From this country a sect of Christians takes its name, their doctrines having been first taught here; but the inhabitants in general are Roman Catholics. Brunn is the capital.

Moravian Village, a village in Upper Canada, on the Thames, between Lakes Huron and Erie. 70 m. E. Detroit. It is inhabited by about 160 Indians, and their pastors, the Moravian missionaries. Here General Harrison defeated the British in 1813.

Morlachia, a mountainous country, lying between, and forming part of the provinces of Croatia and Dalmatia. The inhabitants are called Morlachi, or Moro-blasi, and are said, by some to be of Wallachian extraction. They inhabit the pleasant valleys of Koter, along the rivers Kerha, Cettina, Naranta, and among the inland mountains of Dalmatia. The Morlachi are said to be extremely superstitious, and if injured or insulted, implacable; but hospitable, and in a high degree capable of gratitude: the most pleasing trait of character among them is friendship, which they have even made a kind of religious article; for the Slavonian ritual contains a particular benediction for the solemn union of two male, or two female friends, in the presence of the congregation. The male friends, thus united, are called probratimi, and the female poestreme, which mean half-brothers and half-sisters. From these consecrated friendships among the Morlachi, and other nations of the same origin, arose, as it should seem, the sworn brothers, a denomination frequent among the common people in many parts of Europe. Segna is the capital.

Morlaix, a town of France, department of Finisterre, with a castle and a tide harbour. The church of Notre Dame is a singular structure, and the hospital very handsome. It has a considerable trade in linen, hemp, and tobacco, and is seated on a river of the same name, 30 m. E. N. E. of Brest. Long. 3. 45. W., lat. 48. 33. N.

Morocco, an empire of Africa, comprehending a considerable part of the ancient Mauritania, bounded W. by the Atlantic, N. by the Mediterranean, E. by Algiers, and S. by the Sahara. Its greatest length is above 590 m. but it is no where more than 260 broad. The soil though sandy and dry in some places, is fertile in others; and the fruits, as well as the pastures, are excellent but the country is not properly cultivated. The inhabitants are Mahomedans, of tawny complexion, robust, and very skilful in managing a horse and wielding a lance: they are jealous, deceitful, superstitious, and cruel. There are a great number of Christian slaves and some merchants upon the coast, besides a multitude of Jews, who carry on almost all the trade, especially by land, with the negroes, to whom they send large caravans, which travel over vast deserts, almost destitute of water. Besides woolen goods, their commodities are Morocco leather, indigo, cochineal, and ostriches' feathers; in return for which they have silks, muslins, calicoes, coffee, and drugs. In the deserts are lions, leopards, goats and serpents of several kinds. The fruits are dates, figs, almonds, lemons, oranges, pomegranates, and many others. There are also much flax and hemp, but very little timber. The emperor is absolute, his will being a law, and he often exercises great cruelties. His naval force consists chiefly of rovers, who now and then take large prizes. He can bring 100,000 men into the field, half of whom are foot and half horse; but they are poorly armed and know but little of the art of war. The recent capture of Algiers by the French will no doubt entirely change the political character of this despotic government.

Morocco, a city of the foregoing empire, seated in a beautiful valley, formed by a chain of mountains on the N. and those of Atlas on the S. and E. Though not equal to Fez in magnitude and population, it is generally considered the capital, being the most usual residence of the emperor. It has nothing to recommend it but its great extent and the royal palace. It is surrounded by strong walls, 8 m. in circumference. The mosques are very numerous and some of them magnificent. The best houses are enclosed in gardens; but the generality of them serve only to impress the traveller with the idea of a miserable and deserted city. The Jews, who are numerous, have a separate town, walled in, and under the charge of an alcaid, appointed by the emperor. It has 2 gates, which are regularly shut every evening at nine, after which hour no person can enter or depart. Morocco is 90 m. E. of Magador and 400 S. of Gibraltar. Long. 7. 15. W., lat. 30. 57. N.

Moron, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, with a castle: near it is a mine of precious stones. It is 30 m. S. E. of Seville.

Mosambique, a city and sea-port, the principal settlement of the Portuguese on the E. coast of Africa. It stands on an island of the same name, not more than 3 m. in length and half as much in breadth, and about 2 m. from the continent. The city is handsome, and the buildings well constructed, especially the churches and convents: the fort, or castle, is about a musket shot from the city. The Portuguese have generally a good garrison here, a well stored magazine, and a large hospital for sick sailors. Their ships always call here in going to the E. Indies; and the harbour is so commodious that whole fleets may anchor and provide themselves with all necessaries. Long. 41. 8. E., lat. 15. 5. S.

Mosbach, a town of Germany, in the grand duchy of Baden, with a castle, and manufactures of cloth and salt; seated on the Neckar. 18 m. E. of Heidelberg.

Moscovy. See Russia.

Moscow, formerly a duchy, but now a government of Russia; bounded on the N. by the government of Tver, E. by that of Great Volodimir, S. by the government of Kaluga and Resan, and W. by those of Tver and Smolensko. It is a fruitful country, and a considerable portion is laid out in gardens and orchards.

Moscow, the capital of the above government, and formerly of the whole empire. Previous to the invasion of the French, it was the largest city in Europe, the circumference within the rampart that enclosed the suburbs being 20 m.; but its pop. did not correspond with its extent. It contained, within the ramparts, 300,000 souls and was the most populous city in the empire, notwithstanding the residence of the court was at Petersburg. Moscow is rendered memorable in history, for one of the most extraordinary events that ever took place. In June 1812, the French entered Russia with such an immense army that they threatened to sweep every thing before them like a torrent; and it was generally expected that if they once reached this city, which would afford vast resources for their army, as well as comfortable quarters for the winter, the object of the war would have been completed. On the 8th of September the battle of Borodino took place; victory decided in favour of the French, and the Russians retreated off the field, leaving Moscow to its fate. The road being thus left open, the French entered this city, on the 14th of the same month with little opposition. But a sad reverse of fortune now took place, which preserved the Russian empire from ruin, and paved the way to the downfall of the French military power over Europe. The city was set on fire by the Russians, so that the French were compelled to attempt their retreat, at the moment they thought themselves securely entrenched for the winter. Nothing now remained but to offer terms of peace to the Russians, which were rejected; they next proposed an armistice, which was refused; and, on the 19th of October following, they commenced their calamitous retreat from Moscow. The conflagrations destroyed upwards of three parts of the town; and, shocking to relate, more than 30,000 sick and wounded soldiers, who were in the hospitals, perished in the flames. The old city was distributed into 5 divisions, all of which, not excepting the suburbs, have been rebuilt, with wider streets and greater uniformity in the private dwellings, and the population has nearly reached its former magnitude. The divisions are—1. The Kremlin, in the central and highest part of the city, surrounded by high walls of stone and brick, 2 m. in circumference. The division contained the ancient palace of the czars, where Peter the Great was born; also the cathedral with seven towers, besides other churches, the patriarchal palace, and the arsenal. The palace escaped the conflagration of 1812, but was damaged by the French on their leaving Moscow; it has since been rebuilt, with improvements. 2. The Khitigorod, much larger than the Kremlin, contained the university, the printing-house, and many other public buildings, with all the tradesmen's shops. 3. The Bielgorod, or White Town, ran round the two preceding divisions, and took its name from a white wall, by which it was formerly surrounded. 4. The Semlaingorod environed all the other three quarters, and was so denominated from a circular rampart of earth by which it was encompassed. The last two divisions exhibited a grotesque group of churches, convents, palaces, brick and wooden houses, and mean hovels. 5. The Sloboda, or suburbs, formed a vast exterior circle round all the parts already described, and were invested by a low rampart and ditch. These suburbs contained, besides buildings of all kinds, orchards, gardens, corn-fields, much open pasture, and some small lakes, which give rise to the Neglina. The Moskwa, from which the city takes its name, flows through it in a winding channel; but, excepting in spring, is only navigable for rafts. It receives the Yausa in the Semlainogorod, and the Neglina at the western extremity of the Kremlin; but the beds of both these rivulets are nearly dry in summer. Moscow exhibited an astonishing degree of extent and variety, irregularity and contrast; some parts had the appearance of a sequestered desert; others of a populous town; some of a contemptible village; others a great capital. The streets, in general, were very long and broad; some of them paved; others, particularly in the suburbs, were formed with trunks of trees or boarded with planks like the floor of a house.

The places of divine worship, including chapels, amounted to above 1,500: of these 484 were public churches, some built of brick, stuccoed or white-washed, but the greater part were of wood, painted red some had domes of copper, others of tin, gilt or painted green, and many were roofed with wood. They were richly ornamented within; and the pictures of the saints were decorated with gold, silver, and precious stones. Some of their bells were of a stupendous size; they hung in belfries detached from the church, were fixed immovably to the beams, and rung by a rope tied to the clapper. In the cathedral of St. Michael, the sovereigns of Russia were formerly interred, their bodies being deposited in raised sepulchres, in the shape of coffins, above the pavement. The cathedral of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary was the most magnificent in the city, and had long been appropriated to the coronation of the Russian sovereigns. The foundling hospital, founded by Catherine II., was an immense pile of building, of a quadrangular shape, and capable of containing 8,000 foundlings. Since the fire, the churches and chapels are less numerous than before, but those which have been rebuilt occupy the former sites. Moscow is the centre of the inland commerce of Russia, particularly connecting the trade between Europe and Siberia. The principal manufactures are those of silk, linen, cotton, paper, leather, and sugar. Moscow suffered severely from the pestilential cholera in 1831. Its present pop. is about 300,000. The navigation to this city is formed by the Moskwa, which flows into the Occa, near Kolomna, and that river communicates with the Volga and also by a canal to the Don, which river communicates with the sea of Anaph. 425 m. S. E. of Petersburg. Long. 37. 33. E., lat. 55. 46. N.

Mosquito Shore, a tract of country of the eastern coast of Honduras. It is well watered by navigable rivers and lakes; abounds in fish, game, and provisions of all sorts; furnishes every necessary for raising cattle and stock; and is clothed with woods producing timber for every purpose at land or sea. The soil is superior to that of the W. India Islands, the climate more salubrious and the destructive ravages of hurricanes, and earthquakes are here unknown. It received its name from the immense swarms of mosquitoes which are the torment of the inhabitants and compel them to pass a great part of their time in boats upon the rivers. The Mosquito Indians of this coast are governed by aristocratic chiefs, and number about 1,500 warriors.

This country was held by the English for 80 years, but was ceded to Spain in 1786, in consideration of certain cessionson the coast of Yucatan. It is now included in the Guatemalan Republic. See Guatemala.

Munster, a province of Ireland, 135 m. long and 120 broad; bounded on the N. by Connaught, E. by Leinster, and S. and W. by the Atlantic. It contains the counties of Clare, Tipperary, Waterford, Cork, Limerick, and Kerry. The principal place is Cork.

Munster, a government of the Prussian province of Westphalia. It contains 2,820 sq. m. and is divided into 10 circles or districts—Munster Proper, Tecklenburg, Warendorf, Beckum, Ludinghausen, Koesfeld, Recklinghausen, Berken, Ahans, and Steinfurt. The chief rivers are the Ems and Lippe. The country is level, with some agreeable heights, but no mountains; and it has fruitful plains, fine woods, extensive heaths that feed much cattle, and good quarries of stone. This government consists, for the greater part, of the ancient bishopric of its name which on the secularisation of church property, in 1802, was divided between Prussia, the duke of Oldenburg, and several other princes, all of whom became subject to Prussia in 1815.

Munster, the capital of the foregoing government. The cathedral, the library of the chapter, and many antiquities are worthy of notice. In 1535 a tailor, called John of Leyden, king of the anabaptists, made himself master of the city; but it was retaken in 1536 after 14 months' siege, when John and two of his associates were tortured to death with red-hot pincers. The famous treaty, called the treaty of Westphalia, which ended the 30 years' war, was concluded here in 1648. In the war of 1756 this city sustained several sieges and was taken in 1750. In 1806 the French laid the inhabitants under a heavy contribution, and stripped the churches of their plate. Munster is seated on the Aa, 50 m. E. N. E. of Wesel and 52 W. N. W. of Paderborn. Long. 7. 36. E., lat. 51. 58. N.

Munster, a town of Switzerland, in the cantons of Lucerne, 12 m. N. N. W. of Lucerne.

Mur, or Muhr, a river which rises in the duchy of Salzburg, crosses Styria, and falls into the Drave near Canischa, in Hungary.

Mur de Barrez, a town of France, in the department of Aveyron, 32 m. N. by E. of Rhodex.

Murano, a town of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, on an island of the same name, one of the largest of the Lagunes of Venice. Here the famous Venetian looking-glasses are made. It is 3 m. N. by E. of Venice.

Murat, a town of France, in the department of Cantal, seated on the Alaïgnon near its source, 13 m. N. W. of St. Flour.

Murcia, a province of Spain bounded N. by New Castile, E. by Valencia, W. by Andalusia and Granada, and S. by the Mediterranean. It is 90 m. long and 58 broad; and the principal river is the Segura. The soil is dry, and it produces little corn or wine; but oranges, citrons, lemons, olives, almonds, mulberries, rice, pulse, and sugar are plentiful. It has also a great deal of silk. The vale of Murcia is celebrated for the variety and richness of its culture.

Murcia, the capital of the foregoing province, and a bishop's see. The inhabitants are computed at 60,000. A number of hands are employed in the working of bassweed, and there is also an extensive establishment for twisting silk, and a refinery of salt-petre. There are fine gardens about the city, in which are the best fruits in Spain. It is seated on the Segura, over which is a bridge, 27 m. N. of Carthagena and 212 S. E. of Madrid. Long. 1. 16. W., lat. 37. 58. N.

Murfreesborough, p.t. Rutherford Co. Ten. and formerly the seat of government for the state. 33 m. S. E. Nashville and 160 W. Knoxville. lat. 35. 52. N., long. 86. 35. W. It is situated in the level and fertile country, producing wheat, cotton, and tobacco. Also a p.t. Hertford Co. N. C. on the Meherrin.

Muro, a town of Naples in Basilicata, seated at the foot of the Apennines, 12 m. S. E. of Conza.

Murce, a town of Spain, in Galkia, at the mouth of the Tambre, 29 m. W. by S. of Compostella.

Murray, p.v. Genesee Co. N. Y. 25 m. N. E. Batavia.

Murray Frith, a considerable inlet of the sea, on the coast of Scotland, between Tarbetness in Ross-shire, on the N., and Brough-Head in Murrayshire on the S. It extends in a S. W. direction as far as Inverness, and thence W. to the town of Beaulie, where it receives the river of that name.

Murrayshire, or Elginshire, a county of Scotland, 50 m. in length and 20 along the coast: bounded on the N. by the Frith of Murray, E. by Banffshire, S. by Inverness-shire, and W. by that county and Nairnshire. It is divided into 12 parishes, and the number of inhabitants is about 30,000. The S. part is mountainous and occupied by forests; but the greater part is rich, and produces wheat, barely, oats, and flax. The chief rivers are the Spey, Findhorn, and Lossie. The county town is Elgin.

Musa, a walled town of Arabia, in Yemen, 18 m. E. of Mocha.

Muska, a town of Prussia, in Upper Lusatia, with a castle, seated on the Neisse 25 m. N. N. W. of Gorlitz and 52 N. E. of Dresden.

Muskingum, a river of the state of Ohio, which runs S. into the Ohio, at Marietta, where it is 280 yards wide. It is navigable by large barges 110 m. from its mouth, and by small boats 45 m. further to the lake at its head, whence, by a short portage, a communication is opened to Lake Erie.

Muskingum, a county of Ohio. Pop. 22,325 Zanesville is the capital.

Messelburg, a sea-port of Scotland, in Edinburghshire, near the mouth of the Eak, over which are three bridges to the suburb of Fisharrow. It enjoys many privileges, and has even incorporated trades. Besides the parish church, here are an episcopal chapel and four other places of worship. The principal manufactures are of salt, starch, earthen ware, and leather. 5 m. E. of Edinburgh.

Mustagam, or Mustyganisim, a sea-port of Algiers, in the province of Tremecen, with three castles, 140 m. W. S. W. of the city of Algiers. Long. 0. 30. E., lat. 36. 20. N.

Musuela, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, situate on the river Guadalquivir, 7 m. N. E. of Jén and 50 N. of Granada.

Mutecodu, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, noted for its manufacture of the glass used for making the rings which are worn on the wrists of the native women. It is 34 m. W. of Sera.

Muyden, a fortified town of the Netherlands, in S. Holland, seated on the Zuyder Zee, at the influx of the Vecht, 6 m. E. S. E. of Amsterdam.

Myconi, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, 30 m. in circumference. The soil is dry, and the mountains are of great height. Here are plenty of partridges, quails, woodcocks, turtledoves, rabbits, and wheatears; also excellent grapes and figs. The harbour is open, and deep enough for the largest ships to ride secure from the N. wind. Long. 25. 21. E., lat. 37. 39. N.

Myerstown, p.v. Lebanon Co. Pa., 31 m. E. Harrisburg.

Mysoel, one of the Moluccas, of a triangular form, with a bold shore. The villages are built in the water upon posts, and there are forests visited by the birds of paradise, which are caught in great numbers. Long. 130. 0. E., lat. 2. 0. S.

Mysore, an extensive province of Hindoostan, lying between 11. and 15. N. lat., and now surrounded by the British territories of the Madras Presidency, while the existing rajah is also dependent on British protection. The country is in general dry, rugged, mountainous, and barren; but there are several rivers and mountain torrents, which by artificial means serve to water rice-grounds, gardens, &c. In the forests are many elephants, and tigers are common. Oxen, buffaloes, and goats are numerous, and in the N. E. part many sheep are bred; but horses and asses are few. The chief products are rice, cotton, pepper, cocoa, and betel-nut, sugar-cane, butter, and oil. The whole of this country, with some other territories to the N. and E., and the provinces of Coimbatore, Malabar, and Canara, were subdued by Hyder Ali, a Mussulman, who usurped the throne of Mysore in 1759, and made Seringapatam his capital. He was succeeded by Tippoo Sultan, who continued his father's state of warfare. On the termination of a war, in 1792, Tippoo agreed to pay thirty lacks of rupees, and to cede one half of his dominions to the English and their allies, the Mahrattas and the nizam of the Deccan. In 1799, a new war taking place, his capital was taken by the English, on the 4th of May, and himself killed in the assault. A partition of his remaining territories took place, and, on the 30th of June following, Kistna Rajah, then only five years old, was placed by the British on the throne of his forefathers. The dominions of the rajah of Mysore are now divided into three great districts, Patana to the S., Nagara to the N. W., and Chattrakal to the N. E., so called from the three places where the chief offices are situate. The Patana district is by far the largest, and of itself comprises a much greater extent of territory than was ever before subject to the Mysore family.

Mysore, the capital of the foregoing province, was ruined by Tippoo Sultan; but since the English restored the ancient family in 1799, and made it the rajah's seat of government, the town and fortress have been rebuilt, and the population is rapidly increasing. Mysore is 10 m. S. of Seringapatam. Long. 76. 50. E., lat. 12. 15. N.

NAAS, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Kildare, where the assizes are held alternately with Athy. It was anciently the residence of the kings of Leinster. 17 m. S. W. of Dublin. Long. 6. 42. W., lat. 53. 13. N.

Nab, a river of Germany, which flows S. through the kingdom of Bavaria, and enters the Danube a little above Ratisbon.

Nabal, a town of the kingdom of Tunis, celebrated for its potteries. Near it are several remains of antiquity. It is seated near the sea, 32 m. S. S. E. of Tunis. Long. 10. 19. E., lat. 53. 13. N.

Nabburg, a town of Bavaria, on the river Nab, 10 m. E. S. E. of Amberg.

Nablous, a town of Palestine, capital of a country which was the ancient kingdom of Samaria. It is the residence of a scheik, who farms the tribute to the pacha of Damascus. Here is considerable trade, and the manufactures flourish more than in most cities of the east. The soil of the surrounding country is fertile, and produces a great deal of corn, cotton, olives, and some silk. Nablous is 24 m. N. of Jerusalem and 90 S. S. W. of Damascus. Long. 35. 24. E., lat. 32. 20. N.

Naco, a town of S. America, in Mexico, 50 m. N. W. of Valladolid.

Nacogdoches, a small town in Texas, 120 m. W. of Natchitoches in Louisiana.

Nadir, a town of Egypt, on the W. branch of the Nile, 28 m. N. N. W. of Cairo.

Naefels, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Glaris, near which, in 1388, an unparalleled victory was obtained by 350 troops of Glaris, assisted by 50 Schweitzers, over 15,000 Austrians. In memory of this heroic achievement, a chapel was built on the spot, which was rebuilt in 1779. 4 m. N. of Glaris.

Naerden, a strong town of the Netherlands, in S. Holland, at the head of the canals of the province, of which it is considered the key. In 1572 it was taken by Fernando de Toledo, son of the duke of Alva, and all the inhabitants were massacred. In 1673 it was taken by the French, and retaken by the Prince of Orange the following year. It is seated on the Zuyder Zee, 14 m. E. S. E. of Amsterdam. Long. 5. 11. E., lat. 52. 19. N.

Nagamangala, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a citadel in the centre, both fortified with mud walls. In the outer town a wide street extends all round, with short lanes on each side to the outer and inner wall. In the fort are two large temples and a ruinous palace. 30 m. N. of Seringapatam.

Nagara, or Hyder-nagara, a city of Hindoostan, capital of the district of Bednore. It was formerly called Bidderru, and by Europeans Biddenore; but received its present name in 1763, on being taken by Hyder, who made it his principal arsenal and a place of great magnitude and commerce. It afterwards declined, being neither the seat of a court nor of any public works, except the mint. In 1783 it was taken by the English, and re-taken soon after by Tippoo; but on his final defeat, in 1799, it was ceded by the English to the rajah of Mysore. 70 m. N. by E. of Mangalore and 150 N. W. of Seringapatam. Long. 75. 8. E., lat. 13. 48. N.

Nagaz, a town of Candahar, province of Cabul, on the Cowmull, 79 m. W. by N. of Attock and 120 S. of Cabul.

Nagera, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, with a fort, 3 m. N. W. of Calahorra and 138 N. of Madrid.

Nagold, a town of Germany in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, with a ruined castle; situate on a river of the same name, 15 m. W. of Tubingen.

Nagore, a city of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name in the province of Agimere. 50 m. N. W. of Agimere. Long. 74. 15. E., lat. 27. 9. N.

Nagpore, a city of Hindoostan, capital of the Eastern Mahratta territories. It is extensive and populous, but meanly built; and, excepting a small citadel, is open and defenceless. 560 m W. by S. of Calcutta. Long. 79. 46. E., lat. 21. 9. N.

Nagpore Chuta, (or Little,) a district of Bahar, Hindoostan, constituting the S. W. British frontier, and included in the collectorship of Ramghur. It is one of the wildest and least cultivated districts of British India.

Nagybenja, a town of Hungary and one of the royal free towns. The gold and silver mines are of great produce, and money is coined here. It is 30 m. N. E. of Zatzmar. Long. 22. 54. E., lat. 48. 10. N.

Nahant, a peninsula in Massachusetts Bay, 8 m. N. E. Boston. It belongs to Lynn in Essex Co. and is united to the continent by a narrow isthmus of sand called Lynn Beach. The peninsula has a rocky, uneven surface, and is adorned with many summer cottages belonging to the inhabitants of Boston. During the summer months it is greatly frequented by visitors. Two spacious and elegant hotels built of stone, afford excellent accommodations, and steam-boats pass every hour in the day between Nahant and Boston during the season.

Nahs, a river of Germany, which rises in the territory of Treves, above Birkenfeld, and enters the Rhine at Bingen.

Nahn, a town of Dehli, Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name, and a place of considerable strength. It is the residence of a Hindoo chief, tributary to the rajah of Nepaul. Long. 77. 8. E., lat. 30. 41. N.

Nairn, a borough of Scotland, and capital of Nairnshire, with a small harbour. It is seated at the mouth of a river of the same name, on the Murray Frith, 15. m. N. E. of Inverness and 120 N. of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 6. W., lat. 57. 38. N.

Nairnshire, a county of Scotland, 15 m. long, and 10 broad; bounded N. by the Murray Frith, and enclosed on every side of the counties of Inverness and Murray. It is divided into 4 parishes and sends one member to parliament alternately with Cromarty. The S. part is mountainous, but towards the N. it is level, and the soil abundantly fertile.

Naktsvan, a town of Prussian Armenia, formerly a large city, but ruined by Abbas I., who removed the inhabitants in the interior parts of Persia. Here are now some considerable bazaars, caravanserais, baths, and other public buildings. It is 85 m. S. E. of Erivan and 250 E. of Erzerum. Long. 45. 30. E., lat. 33. 40. N.

Namslau, a town of Prussian Silesia, with a castle. It is situate among morasses on the river Weyda, 20 m. E. S. E. of Breslau.

Namur, a province of the Netherlands, 30 m. long and 20 broad; bounded by the French frontier, and by the Belgic provinces of Hainault, S. Brabant and Liege. It is pretty fertile, and has several forests, marble quarriers, and mines of iron, lead and coal. The rivers Meuse and Sambre divide it into 3 parts, nearly of equal extent. Before the French Revolution of 1789, the greater part of this province belonged to Austria, and the remainder to France. In 1794 the whole was seized by the French, and constituted for 20 years part of the department of Sambre-et-Meuse. It was finally incorporated with the kingdom of the Netherlands in 1815.

Namur, the capital of the above province, and a bishop's see. It has a castle in the middle of the town, on a craggy rock, and several forts. The inhabitants are estimated at 20,000. Fire-arms, swords, knives, and many other kinds of cutlery, are made here. This city was the scene of a sanguinary conflict between the allies and the French in June 1815, and is noted in history as the scene of many early battles. It is seated between two mountains, at the confluence of the Maese and Sambre, 24 m. W. S. W. of Liege and 32 S. E. of Brussels. Long. 4. 45. E., lat. 50. 29. N.

Nasas, a town of Hungary, 23 m. N. W. Debreczin. Pop. 4,000.

Namecvilla, p.v. Harrison Co. Indiana.

Nancy, a city of France, capital of the department of Meurthe, and a bishop's see. It is divided by a canal into the Old and New Town. The former though irregularly built, is rich and populous, and contains the palace of the ancient dukes of Lorraine; and their tombs are in a rich saloon which adjoins the church of the late Cordeliers. The New Town, whose streets are perfectly straight, was one of the finest in Europe, even before the magnificent works with which Stanislaus I., titular king of Poland, and duke of Lorraine, enriched it. The cathedral is a superb structure, and there are several other elegant churches. It was occupied by the allies in 1814. Nancy is seated in a delightful plain, near the river Meurthe, 30 m. S. of Metz and 230 E. of Paris. Long. 6. 10. E., lat. 48. 42. N.

Nandar, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name in the province of Dowletabad. 132 m. N. N. W. of Hyderabad.

Nandidroog, a strong town of Hindoostan, in Mysore. Since the restoration of the rajah, in 1709, it has been garrisoned by English troops. It is 25 m. N. by E. of Bangalore and 64 E. S. E. of Sera.

Naxos, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, a little to the E. of Santorin; it is 26 m. in circumference, but has no harbour, nor springs sufficient to water the fields. The inhabitants are all Greeks, and their chief trade is in onions, wax, and honey. The ruins of the temple of Apollo are yet to be seen, and consist chiefly of marble columns. Long. 26. 10. E., lat. 38. 15. N.

Nyugasaki, a city of Japan, in the island of Ximo, with a good harbour and the only one in the empire in which foreign ships are permitted to anchor. The inhabitants carry on a great trade with the Chinese and Dutch. Long. 129. 46. E., lat. 32. 32. N.

Nangis, a town of France in the department of Seine-et-Marn, 12 m. W. of Provins.

Nanjemog, p.t. Charles Co. Maryland. 45 m. S. Washington.

Nankang, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Kiang-si, seated on the lake Poyang, 637 m. S. of Peking. Long. 113. 58. E., lat. 29. 33. N.

Nanking, a city of China, capital of the province of Kiangnan. It is 17 m. in circumference, and about 3 m. distant from the great river Yangtze-Chiang, from which canals are cut, so large that vessels may enter the town. It was formerly the imperial city, whence it is called Nanking, which signifies southern court; but, since the six grand tribunals have been removed to Peking, it is called Kiangnan in all public acts. The place is greatly fallen from its ancient splendor; for it had a magnificent palace which is quite destroyed, as well as many ancient monuments; and a third part of the city itself is desolate. The streets are narrow, but handsome and well paved, and on each side are shops neatly furnished. The public buildings are mean, except a few temples, the city gates, and a tower of porcelain 200 feet high.

The inhabitants were formerly estimated at 2,000,000, the city being above 30 m. in circumference. The number at present is said to be 1,000,000, without comprehending the garrison of 40,000 men. They have several manufactures in silk and wood. Here the physicians have their principal academy. Nanking is seated on the Siam, 500 m. S. S. E. of Peking. Long 119. 25. E., lat. 32. 46. N.

Nan-ngan, a city of China of the first rank, in Kiangsi. It stands among plantations of sugarcane, near the source of the Kang-kiang, and the foot of the mountain Me-lin, 200 m. N. E. of Canton. Long. 113. 38. E., lat. 24. 48. N.

Nan-ning, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Quang-si, 1,145 m. S. S. W. of Peking. Long. 107. 45. E., lat. 22. 44. N.

Nassomond, a county of the E. district of Virginia. Pop. 11,784. Suffolk is the capital. Also a river flowing through this county into James River at Hampton Roads.

Nantasket, the Indian name of the peninsula on the S. side of Boston Bay. It contains the town of Hull, and is joined to the mainland by a beach of sand several miles in length. The peninsula has several high hills which command one of the entrances into Boston harbour.

Nantasket Road, the name given to that part of the outer harbour of Boston, between Nantasket and the islands to the N. and N. W. just within the outer light.

Nan-ichang, a city of China, capital of Kiang-si. It has no trade but that of porcelain, which is made in the vicinity of Jaatcheou. The country is so much cultivated that the pastures are barely sufficient for the flocks. It is seated on the Kan-kiang, which flows hence into the lake Poyang, 695 m. S. of Peking. Long. 115. 30. E., lat. 23. 36. N.

Nantes, a city of France capital of the department of Lower Loire, and a bishop's see, with a university. It was formerly the residence of the dukes of Bretagne, who built a strong castle on the side of the river, which still exists. The cathedral contains the tombs of the ancient dukes; besides which there are a collegiate church and 11 parish churches. The bridges over the Loire, in which are some islands, are almost a league in length. The suburbs exceed the city in extent. A great quantity of salt is made in the territory of Nantes, both at the bay of Bourgneuf and in the salt marshes of Guelande and Croisic. Large vessels can come no higher than Port Laubai, which is 12 m. from Nantes. The inhabitants are computed at nearly 80,000. It was here that Henry IV. promulgated the famous edict in 1598, in favour of the Protestants which was revoked by Louis XIV. in 1685. Nantes is 58 m. S. by E. of Rennes and 217 S. W. of Paris. Long. 1. 33. W., lat. 47. 13. N.

Nanticoke, p.t. Broome Co N. Y. on a creek of the same name falling into the Susquehanna.

Nanticoke, a hundred of Sussex Co. Del. on a river of the same name falling into the Chesapeake.

Nantmill, E. and W., two townships in Chester Co. Pa. 35 m. N. W. Philad.

Nantua, a town of France, department of Ain, with manufactures of gauzes, taffetas, chintzes, &c. situate on a lake of the same name, 18 m. E. of Bourg.

Nantucket, an island of Massachusetts, 20 m. S. of Cape Cod. It is 15 m. long and 7 broad, and contains 22,360 acres. It is a sandy spot with little vegetation, yet affords grass for the pasture of a few cows and sheep, and supports a population of 7,203. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the whale fishery, and their ships penetrate to the most distant seas on the globe. The island constitutes one town and one county. The principal village is on the N. side of the island, and has a tolerable harbour; the houses are of wood. There are many spermaceti works upon the island. The shipping owned here in 1827 amounted to 26,353 tons. S. E. of Nantucket, out of sight of the island are some dangerous shoals.

Nantwich, a town in Cheshire, Eng. The manufacture of salt was formerly considerable, but it is now confined to a single establishment; and the chief trade consists in the manufacture of shoes for the London and Manchester dealers. The principal dairies of Cheshire are about this town, and it has considerable trade in cheese. It is seated on the Weaver, and by the Chester Canal, which here forms a broad basin, 20 m. S. E. of Chester and 164 N. W. of London.

Nan-yang, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Ho-nan, seated on a small river, and surrounded by mountains, 160 m. S. of Ho-nan.

Nan-yong, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Quantong, seated on the Pei-kiang, near its source, 170 m. N. N. E. of Canton.

Napaul. See Nepaul.

Naples, or the Two Sicilies, a kingdom comprehending the S. part of Italy, bounded on the N. W. by the Ecclesiastical states, N. E. by the gulf of Venice, and every where else by the Mediterranean. It is 300 m. in length by 100 in breadth, and is divided into 13 provinces: namely, Napolia or Naples, Terra di Lavoro (the ancient Campania Felix), Principato Citra and Ultra, Molise, Basilicata, Calabria Citra and Ultra, Abruzzo Citra and Ultra, Capitanata, Terra di Bari, and Terra d' Otranto; the last three forming the ancient Apulia, now called Puglia, on the E. side of the kingdom.

The climate in general is extremely hot, especially in July, August, and September, and is said to be one of the most inconstant and unfavourable to valetudinarians. In some seasons it rains every day for 6 or 7 weeks together; but the most disagreeable part of the climate is the sirocco, or S. E. wind, which is very common in May, and extremely relaxing. In winter there is seldom any ice or snow, except on the mountains. The country abounds with grain, the finest fruits and vegetables, rice, flax, oil, wine, saffron, and manna; and affords alum, vitrol, sulphur, rock crystal, marble, minerals, and fine wool and silk. Besides the manufactures noticed in the account of the city of Naples, waistcoats, caps, stockings, and gloves are also made of the hair or filaments of a shellfish, which are warmer than those of wool and of a beautiful glossy green. The principal mountains are the Apennines (which traverse this country from N. to S., branching to the two extremities) and the celebrated volcano, Mount Vesuvius. The rivers are numerous, but inconsiderable; the chief are the Garigliano and Volturno. One of the greatest inconveniences to which this kingdom is exposed is earthquakes. The established religion is the Roman Catholic; but Protestants and Jews are allowed to settle here. The inhabitants of this country have at all times borne but an indifferent character among other nations; gluttony is here a predominant vice, while instances of ebriety are comparatively rare. In the female sex, the passion for finery is almost superior to every other; and though chastity is not the characteristic virtue of the country, yet a Neapolitan woman would, for the most part prefer a present to a lover. The breach of the conjugal vow sometimes occasions quarrels and assassinations among people of inferior rank; and in the metropolis, assassinations are often perpetrated from much less cogent motives. That furious jealousy for which the nation was once so remarkable is, however greatly abated. See Italy and Sicily.

Naples, a large and rich trading city of Italy, one of the finest in the world, capital of the above kingdom, with a university. It is situated at the bottom of a bay, and is built in the form of a vast amphitheatre, sloping from the hills to the sea. Although the style of architecture is inferior to what prevails at Rome, and it cannot vie with that city in the number of palaces or in the magnificence of the public buildings, yet the private houses in general are better built, and the streets are broader and better paved. No street in Rome equals in beauty the Strada di Toledo at Naples; nor can any of them be compared with the beautiful streets which lie open to the bay, where the excessive heat of the sun is often tempered with the sea breezes and gales wafting the perfumes of the Campagna Felice. The houses in general are 5 or 6 stories high, and flat at the top, on which are placed numbers of flower vases, or fruit trees in boxes of earth, producing a very gay and agreeable effect. On the mountain St. Elmo, in a most pleasant situation, is a convent of Carthusians, on which much expense has been lavished to render the building, the apartments, and the gardens, equal to the situation. Naples is admirably situated for commerce, and has all the necessities and luxuries of life in great profusion. The chief articles manufactured here are silk stockings, soap, snuff-boxes of tortoise-shell or of the lava of Mount Vesuvius, tables, and ornamental furniture of marble. They are thought to embroider here better than in France; and their macaroni is preferred to that of any part of Italy. They excel also in liquors and confections; particularly in one kind of confection, called diaboloni, of a very hot and stimulating nature, and which is sold at a very high price.

The number of inhabitants is computed at 350,000, which is very probable; for, though Naples is not one-third of the size of London, yet many of the streets here are more crowded than the Strand, and a great proportion of the poorest sort are obliged to spend the night in them, as well as the day, for want of habitations. There is not a city in the world, perhaps, with the same number of inhabitants, in which so few contribute to the wealth of the community, by useful and productive labour; the number of priests, monks, siddlers, lawyers, nobility, footmen, and lazzaroni or vagabonds, is immense: the last alone have been computed at above 30,000, but their number has since been somewhat diminished. The nobility are excessively fond of splendour and show, as appears by the brilliancy of their equipages, the number of their attendants, the richness of their dress, and the grandeur of their titles. The king, it is said counts 100 persons with the title of prince and still a greater number with that of duke, among his subjects. Six or seven of these have estates of from £10,000 to £13,000 a-year, and a considerable number have possessions to about half that amount; while the annual revenue of many is not above £1,000 or £2000. The inferior nobility are much poorer, many counts and marquises not having above £300 or £400 a-year, of a paternal estate, many still less, and not a few enjoying the title without any estate whatever. Although the churches and convents of Naples are not to be compared with those of Rome in point of architecture, they surpass them in rich jewels, and in the quantity of silver and golden crucifixes, vessels, and other ornaments. The cathedral is a grand Gothic edifice; and, of all the palaces, that of the king is not only the most magnificent, but in the best style of architecture. The harbour, which is spacious is protected by a mole. The bay of Naples is one of the finest in the world, being almost of a circular figure, about 30 m. in diameter, shut out from the Mediterranean by the island of Capri, and three parts of it sheltered by a circuit of woods and mountains. Naples was taken by the French in January, 1799, but retaken by the British fleet under lord Nelson, in the June following. In 1806 it was again taken possession of by the French under Massena, soon after which Joseph Bonaparte was here crowned king of Naples; but on his removal to Spain, in 1808, the crown was conferred on Murat. In May, 1815, Naples was surrendered to a British squadron, and in the following month king Ferdinand was restored. In 1803 the city suffered much damage by an earthquake. It is 110 m. S. E. of Rome, 104 N. E. of Palermo, and 300 S. by E. of Venice. Long. 14. 20. E., lat. 14. 55. N.

Napoli de Romania, a sea-port of the Morea, and an archbishop's see, seated on a peninsula, at the head of a bay, of the same name. It has a large harbour, with a narrow entrance, defended by a citadel. This town was taken by the Turks in 1715, and remained under the government of the Porte till the recent dismemberment of Greece. It is 20 m. S. S. W. of Corinth. Long. 22. 44. E., lat. 37. 44. N.

Napoli di Malvasia, a sea-port of the Morea, on the island of Malvasia. It has a fine harbour defended by a good citadel; and a long wooden bridge, which joins it to the mainland. It gives name to that excellent wine called Malmsey; and was the ancient Epidaurus, famed for the temple of Æsculapius. It is seated on a rock, at the entrance of the bay of Napoli de Romania, 38 m. S. E. of Misitra. Long. 22. 58. E., lat. 36. 53. N.

Nara, a town of Japan, in the island of Nippon, with a magnificent castle, 25 m. N. W. of Meaco.

Naraingunge, a town of Bengal, in the district of Dacca, with manufactures of muslin, and a trade in grain, salt, tobacco, &c. It is seated on the Luckia. Long. 90. 35. E., lat. 23. 36. N.

Narasinghapura, a town of Hindooستان, in Mysore, with two considerable temples. It is well built, and stands in a fertile country, on the Cavery, immediately below the influx of Kapina, 30 m. E. S. E. of Mysore.

Narbeth, a town of Wales, in Pembrokeshire, seated on a hill, 12 m. N. E. of Pembroke and 242 W. by N. of London.

Narbonne, a city of France, in the department of Aude. In the time of the Romans it was the capital of that part of Gaul called Gallia Narbonensis; and here the emperor Marcus Aurelius was born. Some Roman inscriptions, in different parts of the city are still visible; and the canal from the river Aude, through the city to the Mediterranean, was cut by the Romans. Narbonne is famous for its honey, and the cathedral is remarkable for its noble choir. It is 5 m. from the Mediterranean and 80 E. S. E. of Toulouse. Long. 3. 0. E., lat. 43. 11. N.

Narborough, an uninhabited island in the S. Pacific, on the coast of Chile, where Sir John Narborough refreshed his men when sent to the South Sea, in the reign of Charles II. Long. 74. 35. W., lat. 45. 0. N.

Nardo, a town of Naples, in Terra d' Otranto, 22 m. W. by N. of Otranto.

Narenza, a town of Dalmatia, and a bishop's see; seated on a river of the same name, 42 m. N. N. W. of Ragusa.

Narim, a town of Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk, surrounded by pallisades and wooden towers. The environs abound with foxes, ermines, and sables. It is seated at the conflux of the Ket with the Oby, 400 m. E by N. of Tobolsk. Long. 81. 15. E., lat. 59. 10. N.

Narnalla, a town and fortress of Hindoostan, province of Berar, 33 m. W. N. W. of Ellichpour.

Narni, a town of Italy, in the states of the church. Here are the ruins of a marble bridge, built by Augustus; and also of an aqueduct that brought water from a spring at the distance of 15 m. It is seated on the Nera, 20 m. S. S. W. of Spoleto, and 40 N. of Rome.

Naro, a town of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, on a river of the same name, 11 m. E. of Girgenti.

Narova, a river of Russia, which issues from the lake Peipus, flows to Narva, and enters the gulf of Finland 8 m. below that town. It has two cataracts, pompously described by travellers; but they are far inferior to that of the Rhine at Lauffen.

Narraganset Bay, in Rhode Island State, extends from N. to S. dividing the state into two parts. It is separated into several distinct channels by the islands which it embosoms. The largest are Conanicut and Rhode Island. The length of the bay is about 30 m. and its breadth 15. It affords many excellent harbours and is accessible at all seasons of the year. It receives many rivers, and the cities of Providence and Newport with other small towns lie upon its waters.

Narraguagus, p.v. Washington Co. Me. 37 m. W. Machias, on a river of the same name.

Narsingapatam, a town of Hindoostan, in the territory of Cattack, near the coast of the bay of Bengal, 44 m. S. of Cattack.

Narva, a strong town of Russia, in the government of Petersburg. The houses are built of brick and stuccoed white; and it has more the appearance of a German than of a Russian town. In the suburb called Ivangorod are the stupendous remains of an ancient fortress, built by Ivan Basilowitz the Great, which impend over the steep banks of the Narova. In 1700 Charles XII. of Sweden obtained a victory here over Peter the Great. Five years after, the czar took the town by assault; and, by his own personal exertions, saved it from pillage and massacre. The principal exports are hemp, flax, timber, and corn. It is situate on the Narova, 8 m. from its mouth and 86 W. S. W. of Petersburg. Long. 27. 52. E., lat. 59. 18. N.

Narwar, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a fertile district of the same name, in the province of Agra; seated near the Sinde, 115 m. S. of Agra. Long. 78. 17. E., lat. 25. 40. N.

Nasca, a sea-port of Peru, in the audience of Lima. It has a good harbour, and stands in a territory fertile in wine and sugar, 290 m. S. S. E. of Lima. Long. 75. 10. W., lat. 14. 45. S.

Naseby, a village in Northamptonshire, Eng. famous for the decisive victory gained by the army of the parliament over that of Charles I. in 1645. 12 m. N. N. W. of Northampton.

Nash, a county of N. Carolina. Pop. 8,492. Nashville is the capital.

Nashua, a branch of the Merrimack, rising in Worcester County Mass. and falling into the Merrimack at Dunstable, N. H. It is 40 m. long.

Nashuan, one of the Elizabeth Islands, on the S. side of Buzzard's Bay, in Dukes Co. Mas.

Nashville, p.t. Davidson Co. Tennessee, and the seat of government for the state. It is seated on the S. branch of Cumberland river near some high bluffs. The site is pleasant and healthy and the town is much visited during the hot season by people from the lower country. Here is a branch of the United States Bank. The Cumberland is navigable to this place by steam-boats. The University of Nashville was founded in 1806. It has 4 instructors and 95 students, the libraries have 3,250 vols. It has two vacations of 11 weeks. Pop. 5,566.

Nashville, p.v. Nash Co. N. C. 50 m. N. E. Raleigh.

Naskow, a town of Denmark, in the island of Laaland, with a convenient harbour, seated on a bay of the same name, 15 m. W. by N. of Marieboe.

Nassau, an independent duchy of Germany, formed of the several principalities which formerly bore this name. It is bounded by the Prussian territory on the Lower Rhine and the states of the princes of Hesse. It contains mines of iron, copper, and lead, and the soil is fertile in some places, but the surface is for the most part woody and mountainous. The rearing of cattle and the culture of the vine are the principal occupations of the inhabitants. The duke of Nassau holds the 13th place at the smaller assembly of the German diet and has two votes in the full assembly.

Nassau, a town of Germany, in the above duchy, the only place belonging in common to the duke of Nassau and the king of the Netherlands. Opposite the town, on the other side of the river, and on a high mountain, formerly stood Nassauberg, a place of great antiquity, and the original seat of the Nassau family. Nassau is 32 m. W. N. W. of Frankfort. Long. 7. 52. E., lat. 50. 16. N.

Nassau, p.t. Rensselaer Co. N. Y. 15 m. S. E. Albany. Pop. 3,254.

Nassau, an island in the Indian Ocean, on the W. side of the island of Sumatra, about 120 m. in circumference. It abounds with forests, and presents an enchanting verdure. The inhabitants are dissimilar from their neighbours; for they approach the simplicity of manners and personal appearance of the Otaheitans, while their color is like that of the Malays. Long. 99. 40. E., lat. 2. 50. S.

Nassuck, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Guzerat, 95 m. S. S. W. of Surat. Long. 73. 49. E., lat. 19. 50. N.

Nata, a sea-port of Terra Firma, in the province of Panama, seated in a fertile country, on the bay of Panama, 68 m. S. W. of Panama. Long. 81. 5 W., lat. 8. 36. N.

Natal, a country on the S. E. coast of Africa, lying N. E. of the Cape of Good Hope, inhabited by a tribe of Caffres. It is about 500 m. in length, and near the middle is a river and also a bay of the same name. Long. 31. 30. E., lat. 29. 0. S.

Natchez, p.t. Adams Co. Mississippi, on the eastern branch of the river Mississippi, 156 m. above New Orleans by land, and 322 by the river. It is the only large town in the state, and has a great trade in cotton. Steam-boats and river shipping frequent this place in great numbers, and make it one of the busiest towns upon the river. It is situated upon a bluff 300 feet above the river and is surrounded by a level country. It is often visited by the yellow fever. A branch of the United States Bank is established here. Pop. 2,790.

Natchitoches, a parish of Louisiana. Pop. 7,926. The capital is the following.

Natchitoches, p.t. on Red River, Lou. 35 6 m. N. W. New Orleans. It is the frontier town of the United States toward Mexico, and the centre of communication for the land trade with that country. It was settled above a century ago, and its inhabitants are composed of French, Spanish and Indian descendants intermingled with native and emigrant Americans. Its trade with Mexico consists in the exportation of manufactured goods, spirits and tobacco, for which it receives in return, silver bullion, horses and mules. This town is the resort of many fugitives and desperate characters from the United States, but the stationary population is respectable.

Natick, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 18 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 890.

Natolia, a country formerly called Asia Minor. It is the most western part of the great continent of Asia, bounded N. by the Black Sea, E. by the Euphrates, S. by the Mediterranean, and W. by the Archipelago and the Sea of Marmora. It is crossed by a chain of mountains, formerly called Taurus, from W. to E., and watered by a great number of rivers. The soil is generally fertile, producing fruits of various kinds, corn, tobacco, cotton, and silk. The whole country has suffered severely from Turkish oppression.

Natiam, a town and fortress of Hindoostan, in the district of Dindigal, 45 m. S. S. W. of Trichinopoly.

Natore, a town of Bengal, seated on the river Attri, 47 m. E. N. E. of Moorahedabad.

Natural Bridge, p.v. Rockbridge Co. Va. 176 m. W. Richmond. See Rockbridge.

Neuen, a town of Prussia, in Brandenburg, 18 m. W. N. W. of Berlin.

Neusberg, a town of Germany, in Hesse Cassel, situate on the Eider, 16 m. W. S. W. of Cassel.

Neusburg, a town of Prussian Saxony, in the government of Merseburg, formerly capital of a duchy of the same name. It has a small citadel, and its cathedral is remarkable for its fine altars, paintings, and subterranean chapels. The chief manufactures are leather, soap, starch, gunpowder, turnery wares, &c.; and its town carries on a brisk trade. It is seated on the Saale, 18 m. W. S. W. of Merseburg. Long. 12. 0. E., lat. 51. 11. N.

Neusburg, a town of Prussian Silesia, in the government of Leignitz, on the river Queis, 11 m. N. W. of Lowenburg.

Neven, a town of Ireland, in the county of Meath, seated at the conflux of the Blackwater with the Boyne, 7 m. N. E. of Trim and 26 N. W. of Dublin.

Navarino, a sea-port on the W. coast of the Morea, with a large harbour defended by two forts. It is memorable for the destruction of the Turkish and Egyptian fleet, by the English, French, and Russians, in 1827. It is seated on a hill, 10 m. N. by E. of Modon and 86 S. W. of Corinth. Long. 21. 25. E., lat. 37. 5. N.

Navarre, a province of Spain, containing the greater part of the ancient kingdom of Navarre. It is 75 m. long and 60 broad. Though a mountainous country, abounding in game and iron mines, some valleys produce good corn and excellent wine. Pampeluna is the capital.

Navarre, New, a former province of Mexico, now divided into various modern intendancies.

Navarreins, a town of France, department of Lower Pyrenees, on the Gave d' Oleron, 26 m. S. E. of Bayonne.

Navigator's Islands, a cluster of ten islands in the Pacific Ocean, discovered by Bougainville, and explored by Perouse in 1787. They are called by the natives Opoun, Leone, Fanfoue, Maouna, Oyalava, Calinasse, Pola, Shika, Ossamo, and Ouero. Opoun, the most southerly and easterly of these islands, lies in long. 169. 7. W., lat. 14. 7. S. Maouna, Oyalava, and Pola, may be numbered among the largest and most beautiful islands of the S. Pacific. They combine the advantages of a soil fertile without culture and a climate that renders clothing unnecessary. The inhabitants are a strong and lusty race; scarcely a man is to be seen among them less than six feet high, and the women are in proportion. In disposition they are thievish, treacherous, and ferocious. Their villages are situate on creeks, by the seaside, and have no paths between them; so that they pass from one to another in their canoes, and thus are almost constantly on the water. Their canoes, houses, &c., are well constructed: and they are much more advanced in internal policy than any of the islands in this ocean. See Maouna.

Nazia, or Nazas, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, 15 m. in length and 50 in circumference. It is fertile in grain, wine, oil, cotton, and silk; and its plains abound with orange, olive, lemon, cedar, citron, pomegranate, fig, and mulberry trees. It has a great many villages; but the population of the whole island does not exceed 10,000. The highest mountain is Zila, which signifies the mountain of Jupiter: but there are no antiquities, except some small remains of a temple of Bacchus.

Nazia, the capital of the above island, and one of the most beautiful places in the Archipelago. It has two archiepiscopal sees, the one Greek and the other Latin. Here is no harbour, but the trade is considerable in barley, wine, oil, figs, cotton, silk, flax, cheese, salt, oxen, sheep, and mules. It stands on the S. side of the island, and is defended by a castle. Long. 25. 32. E., lat. 37. 8. N.

Nayakanahully, a large square town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a citadel in the centre, both strongly fortified with mud walls. In the town a wide street extends all round, and has short lanes on each side. It has a manufacture of coarse cotton cloth, and in the vicinity are many palm gardens. It is 34 m. S. W. of Sera.

Nazareth, a town of Palestine, celebrated as the residence of Christ, in the early part of his life. It is now a small place, where the monks of St. Francis have a convent. 50 m. N. N. E. of Jerusalem.

Nazareth, Upper and Lower, two townships in Northampton Co. Pa. 7 m. N. W. Easton. The inhabitants are Moravians, and here was their first settlement in the country.

Naze, or Lindeness, the most southern promontory of Norway. Long. 7. 20. E., lat. 57. 30. N.

Naugh, Lough, a lake of Ireland, 20 m. long and 15 broad, lying in the counties of Armagh, Down, Antrim, Londonderry, and Tyrone. The river Bann flows through it.

Neath, a corporate town of Wales, in Glamorganshire. In the neighbourhood are iron forges, smelting works for copper, and coal mines; and on the other side of the river are the extensive remains of an abbey. A great quantity of coal is exported hence in small vessels. It is situate on the river Neath, near the Bristol Channel, 27 m. S. W. of Brecknock and 198 W. of London.

Neath, a river of Wales, which rises in Brecknockshire, and runs through Glamorganshire, by the town of Neath, into the Bristol Channel.

Nel, a river in the Isle of Man, which runs into the Irish Sea at Peel Castle.

Nebio, or Nebbio, a ruined city on the N. side of the island of Corsica, 1 mile from St. Fiorenzo.

Nebra, a town of Prussian Saxony, in Thuringia, on the Unstrut, 12 m. N. N. W. of Naumburg.

Neckar, a river of Germany, which rises in Wurtemberg, flows by Rothwiel, Tubingen, Esslingen, Heilbron, and Heidelberg, and enters the Rhine at Mannheim. This river gives name to three departments of Wurtemberg, Upper, Lower, and Middle, and also to the two following circles.

Neckar, a circle of the grand duchy of Baden, comprehending that part of the Lower Palatinate lying to the E. of the Rhine. Mannheim is the capital.

Neckar, one of the four circles of Wurtemberg, comprehending the W. part of the kingdom, according to the division made in 1818.

Neckargemund, a town of Baden, on the Neckar, 5 m. E. of Heidelberg.

Neckarsulm, a town of Wurtemberg, seated at the conflux of the Neckar and Sulm, 5 m. N. of Heilbron.

Nedroma, a town of Algiers, in the province of Mascara, surrounded with magnificent ruins. It is 50 m. W. S. W. of Oran. Long. 0. 38. W., lat. 35. 40. N.

Nedsjed, an extensive province of Arabia, bounded N. by the desert of Syria, E. by Lachsa, S. by Hadramaut and Yemen, and W. by Hedjaz. The soil is various, and in many parts very fertile. The Bedouins inhabit a great part of this province; the remainder is mountainous, and contains a great number of towns, almost every one of which has its own chief.

Needham, a town in Suffolk, Eng. seated on the Orwell, 9 m. N. W. of Ipswich and 74 N. E. of London.

Needham, p.t. Norfolk Co. Mass. 12 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 1,420. It is seated on the river Charles, and has manufactures of paper.

Needles, a cluster of rocks in the English Channel, at the W. end of the Isle of Wight, so called from their height and sharp extremities. Here is a light-house. Long. 1. 33. W., lat. 50. 44. N.

Nekeehow, one of the Sandwich Islands, in the N. Pacific, five leagues W. of Atooli. The E. coast is high, and rises abruptly from the sea: the rest of it consists of low ground, except a round bluff head on the S. E. point. Long. 160. 15. W., lat. 21. 50. N.

Neerwinden, a village of the Netherlands, in N. Brabant, a little N. by W. of Landen. Hence the two celebrated battles of Landen are sometimes called by the name of Neerwinden. See Landen.

Nefta, a town of the kingdom of Tunis, 250 m. S. by W. of Tunis. Long. 9. 25. E., lat. 30. N.

Negapatam, a city of Hindoostan in the district of Tanjore, on the coast of Coromandel. It was first a colony of the Portuguese, but was taken by the Dutch; and the latter were dispossessed of it by the English in 1782. The port is not extraordinary; but most of the different nations in India are here settled, and trade under the protection of the fort. The Wesleyan Methodists have two missionaries here. It is 50 m. E. of Tanjore and 166 S. by W. of Madras. Long. 79. 56. E., lat. 10. 46. N.

Negara, a town of the isle of Borneo, capital of the kingdom of Banjarmassing; situate on the E. side of the river Banjar, 60 m. N. of the town of Banjarmassing. Long. 114. 0. E., lat. 1. 40. S.

Negombo, a sea-port on the W. coast of the isle of Ceylon, with a fort built by the Portuguese. It was taken in 1640 by the Dutch, who evacuated it to the English in 1796. It is 16 m. N. of Colombo. Long. 79. 55. E., lat. 7. 20. N.

Negrais, an island on the E. side of the bay of Bengal, at the mouth of Basien River, the most western branch of the Irrawaddy, with an excellent harbour. Long. 94. 30. E., lat. 16. 0. N.

Negril Point, the most westerly promontory of the island of Jamaica. Long. 78. 23. W., lat. 18. 17. N.

Negro Cape, a promontory of Africa, on the coast of Benguela, being the most southerly country to which the Europeans usually resort to purchase slaves. Long. 11. 40. E., lat. 16. 15. N.

Negroland, or Nigritia, a large country in the interior of Africa, through which the river Niger flows from W. to E. It is called by the Arabs Soudan, a word of similar import to the European appellation, signifying the Land of the Blacks. It extends from long. 10. W. to 27. E., and from lat. 10. to 25. N.; being bounded on the N. by the Zahara and the mountains which separate it from the states of Barbary, on the E. by Nubia and Abyssinia, on the S. by countries unknown and Guinea, and W. by Guinea, Pouli, and Zahara. Of this vast country little is known more than the names of some of the towns and great kingdoms of which it is composed. Some parts, particularly on the river Niger are said to be exceedingly fertile; other parts are represented as sandy and desert. Among the animals of the territory may be noticed the Panther, a fierce insidious and cruel animal who attacks not only beasts, but man, taking the precaution always to approach him from behind. Major Denham saw one killed in this country, above 8 feet in length. The principal territory known is Bornou. The general character of the negroes, who are the inhabitants of this region, is that of levity. They do not appear to want the feelings of humanity, nor are they more destitute of sagacity than other people of an equal degree of education; but as their country supplies them with food by a very slight degree of industry, and there is little occasion for clothing amid the heat of their climate, they have a general habit of seeking present pleasure, and no care for the future. The only necessary of life that appears to be deficient is salt, which is the more wanted among them in consequence of their subsisting chiefly on vegetable food; and it is a proverbial expression of a man's riches to say that he eats salt with his food. This important article they receive from Zahara by caravans of trading Arabs. They also receive arms, hardware, glasses, and trinkets, from the W., by the Europeans, and, in the interior, by the caravans of Cairo, Fezzan, and Morocco. For these they give in return gold dust, ivory, and elephants' teeth. The kind of government that exists among the negro nations is by no means uniform. Many districts are governed by a number of independent petty chiefs, who are engaged in frequent wars with each other. In other places, the talents of individual chieftains have been able to reduce considerable tracts of territory under their dominion; and hence some flourishing towns have sprung up. Many of the towns are fortified with ditches and high walls. Domestic slavery prevails in a very great degree among all the negro states. When the tropical rains fall, or are so deficient that the sun burns up the face of the country, it is not uncommon for parents to sell their children, and even themselves, for bread. A free man may also lose his liberty by being taken prisoner in war, or on account of the crimes of murder and sorcery; and also in consequence of insolvency. The knowledge of the negroes, with regard to religion and all speculative subjects, is extremely limited; but they have much superstition, and are implicit believers in witchcraft and magic.

Negropont, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, 100 m. in length and 18 in breadth, anciently called Eubœa. It is near the N. coast of Livadia, and separated from it by the strait of Euripus over which is a bridge. It abounds in corn, wine, oil, and fruits. It forms a part of Independent Greece.

Negropont, a strong city, capital of the above island, and an archbishop's see, with a good harbour. The walls of the city are 2 m. and a half in circumference, but the suburbs are much larger. It is seated on a strait of the same name, 30 m. N. E. of Athens and 260 S. W. of Constantinople. Long. 24. 8. E., lat. 38. 30. N.

Nehavend, a town of Irak, in Persia, famous for a battle fought near it between the caliph Omar and Yez Degerd, king of Persia, in 638, when the latter lost his life and kingdom. It is 200 m. N. W. of Isfahan. Long. 48. 10. E., lat. 34. 20. N.

Nepaul, a kingdom of Northern Hindoostan, bounded N. by the Himmaleh Mountains, S. by the provinces of Behar, Cude, and Dehli, E. by Bootan, and the territory of the rajah of Si Kim. The soil is productive and in some places yields two crops in the year. The mountains of Nepaul contain mines of copper and iron; and, although commerce is not encouraged, it sends to Bengal ivory, wax, honey, resin, timber, bastard cinnamon, cardamoms, walnuts, &c.; and takes, in return, muslins and silks of Bengal, carpets, spices, tobacco, and European goods. In 1814, in consequence of the repeated encroachments of the Nepauls, the British invaded their territories, and dictated to them a treaty of peace in 1816. By this treaty Nepaul is limited on the W to the river Gogra; the British have gained possession of the province of Kemaon, and a British envoy constantly resides at Cattamandoo, the capital of Nepal.

Ness, Loch, a lake of Scotland, in Inverness-shire, 22 m. long and from 1 to 2 broad. The depth is very considerable; and the high hills on each side present a delightful view of wood, pasture, cultivated lands and rugged precipices. It was agitated in an extraordinary manner during the great earthquake at Lisbon in 1755. Its outlet, at the N. extremity, is the river Ness, which runs into Murray Frith, below Inverness.

Nestved, a town of Denmark, in the island of Zealand, 38 m. S. W. of Copenhagen.

Netherlands, or Low Countries, a kingdom of Europe, established in 1814, bounded on the W. and N. by the German Ocean, E. by Hanover and the Prussian territories of the Lower Rhine, and S. by France. It was composed of the former republic of Holland, the 10 provinces constituting the Austrian Netherlands, the grand duchy of Luxemburg, and the former principality or bishopric of Liege: it was divided into the provinces of Holland, E. Flanders, W. Flanders, Hainault, S. Brabant, Liege, Limburg, N. Brabant, Antwerp, Guelderland, Friesland, Namur, Overysel, Groningen, Zealand, Utrecht, Drenthe, and Luxemburg. The surface of the country, especially the northern provinces, is uncommonly level, and is covered with woods, corn fields, and vast meadows of the freshest verdure. The maritime provinces have undergone great physical revolutions, especially from the retreat and encroachments of the sea, along with the changes in the course of the Rhine. So lately as the 15th century, a great salt-water lake was suddenly formed to the S. E. of Dort, which overwhelmed 72 villages, and 100,000 inhabitants are supposed to have perished. To prevent the recurrence of such dreadful calamities, the Dutch began to secure their coasts, as also the banks of the great rivers, by dikes, or mounds of earth, the erection of which has been justly considered one of the greatest efforts of human industry. The climate in the maritime provinces is humid and variable; in the interior it is more constant. The summers are warmer, and the winters colder than in England. The soil is in general fertile, and agriculture has been long prosecuted with care and success. The principal productions are corn, flax, hemp, tobacco, hops, madder, fruit, and a little wine in the S. Cattle are reared in great numbers, and vast quantities of excellent butter and cheese are made for exportation. There are no minerals in the northern provinces. In the S. there are some valuable strata of coal, mines of iron, copper, lead, calamine, and zinc. The principal rivers are the Rhine, with its different branches, the Maese, and the Scheldt. These rivers, and the multitude of canals with which the country is intersected, afford an easy and safe navigation, not only to all parts of the kingdom, but to the W. of Germany, the N. of France, and even to Switzerland. The lakes are comparatively inconsiderable; the principal is that of Haarlem.

During several centuries the Netherlands took the lead of all the neighbouring states, both in trade and manufactures, the linen of Holland, the lace of Brussels, the leather of Liege, the woollens of Leyden and Utrecht, and the silks of Amsterdam and Antwerp, being known several centuries ago throughout Europe. From their situation, at the mouth of so many large rivers, both the Dutch and Flemish had an early and extensive trade. The number of vessels employed by the Dutch in the fisheries, particularly the herring fishery, is said to have exceeded that of all the rest of Europe. At a later date came their acquisitions in the E. and W. Indies, while they also carried on extensive transactions with America and the coast of Guinea. The commerce of this country, however, experienced a great decline after its connexion with France, and though considerably revived since the expulsion of the French in 1814, yet owing to overstrained taxation and the rivalry of England, it will be a long time before the country can recover its former prosperity. The constitution resembled in many respects that of Great Britain; though it also approximates to the federal government of the United States of America, in consequence of the long existence of provincial customs, particularly among the Dutch. The royal power was vested in the family of Nassau-Orange, with the title of king of the Netherlands, prince of Orange, and grand duke of Luxemburg. The parliament was divided into two houses.

The character of the inhabitants in the northern and southern provinces differs considerably. The Dutch have been long distinguished as a labor ous and persevering people, not devoid of enterprise, but led much more rarely than the English and Americans into adventurous speculations of doubtful success. The Belgians have less uniformity in their habits and disposition; on the borders of Holland they are hardly to be distinguished from the Dutch, while in the provinces to the S. the dress and habits of the French are prevalent. Calvinism is the established religion of the northern provinces, the Roman Catholic that of the southern; but there are no political disqualifications on account of religious tenets.

The earliest accounts we have of the history of this country, are from the Romans, by whom all the southern and central part was conquered, and called by them Belgium. After several political changes, the country came into the possession of the house of Burgundy, and by marriage, passed to Maximilian of Austria, father of Charles V. The latter united the 17 provinces into one state: but the bigotry and tyranny of his son Philip II. produced the separation of the 7 United Provinces. The other 10 however, continued under the Spanish crown till 1702, when Louis XIV. obtained possession; but after the battle of Ramillies, in 1706, the Netherlands were brought under the power of the allies, and assigned to the Austrians by the peace of Utrecht. In 1741 the French under marshal Saxe recovered what the preceding generation had lost; but at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle the country was again restored to Austria. In 1792 the French overran the Austrian Netherlands: they were driven out of the country in 1793; but returned in 1794, and subdued every part of it; and in 1795 decreed it, with the territories of Liege and Upper Guelderland, an integral part of the French republic. To this country they gave the name of Belgium, and divided it into 9 departments; but in 1814, agreeably to the treaty of Paris, they evacuated all that part which formerly belonged to Austria and Holland: and the 17 provinces were united and formed into an independent state.

The above comprises the description and history of the kingdom of the Netherlands as organized in 1815 and as it remained for 15 years afterwards. This kingdom no longer exists. The people of Belgium, or the southern part of the kingdom never became cordially reconciled to their union with Holland, and various minor causes of discontent served to augment their dislike to the government. The revolution of the three days at Paris set them the example of resistance. On the 26th of August 1830 the populace of Brussels rose in insurrection and hoisted the ancient flag of Brabant. Conflicts with the Dutch troops attended with terrible carnage followed, and ended with the formal separation of Belgium from Holland. The crown of Belgium has been successively offered to the Duke of Nemours, a son of Louis Philippe, and Prince Leopold, but the affairs of the country remain in so uncertain a condition that nothing satisfactory can be stated as to its present situation or future prospects.

The population of the kingdom of the Netherlands in 1828 was 6,977,500. Belgium comprised about 3 5ths of this number. In 1831 a census of Holland gave 2,445,550.

Neuburg, called also the Younger Palatinate, formerly a duchy of the German empire, but now incorporated in the Bavarian circles of Upper Danube and Regen.

Neuchatel, or Neufchatel, a canton of Switzerland, between the lake of Neuchatel and the borders of France. It is a hilly country, and is watered by several lakes and rivers. The soil is not equally fertile; but there are large vineyards that produce white and red wine, of excellent quality. The pastures on the mountains feed a great number of cattle, and there are plenty of deer in the forests. The inhabitants are Protestants, except in the two districts of Landeron and Cressier, where the Catholics are predominant. This district, along with that of Vallengin, was formerly a separate principality. On the death of the duchess of Nemours, in 1707, the sovereignty was claimed by Frederic I. of Prussia, as heir to the prince of Orange, and his right was acknowledged by the states of the country, whose privileges and alliances he confirmed. In 1806 Neuchatel was ceded by the king of Prussia to the French marshal Berthier, and the grant was confirmed by Napoleon. In 1814 it was rescued from this subjection, and the congress of Vienna acknowledged it a Swiss canton, though the nominal sovereignty of Prussia was preserved.

Neuchatel, the capital of the above canton, is situated partly on the plain between the lake of Neuchatel and the Jura, and partly on the side of that mountain. The chief article of exportation is wine, produced from the neighbouring vineyards and much esteemed; and it has manufactures of printed linens and cottons. 25 m. N. E. of Lausanne and 25 W. of Bern. New Brunswick, p.t. Middlesex Co. N. J. on the Raritan, 30 m. N. E. Trenton and 36 S. W. New York. It stands at the head of sloop navigation with a considerable trade in flour and grain. Pop. 7,831. Rutgers College at this place was founded in 1770. It has 5 instructors and 70 students.

New Brunswick. See Brunswick.

Newburg, p.t. Orange Co. N. Y. on the Hudson 84 m. S. Albany, and 70 N. New York. Pop. 6,424. It is finely situated on the side of a hill close to the river, and has considerable trade.

Newburgh, a town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, with a good harbour on the frith of Tay. Here the large vessels belonging to Perth unload their goods into lighters. The principal manufacture is linen. 10 m. S. E. of Perth.

Newburgh, a town of Wales, in the isle of Anglesey, 250 m. N. W. of London.

Newbury, a town in Berkshire, Eng. its manufactures of druggets, shalloons, and broad cloths, formerly very extensive, are greatly declined; but a considerable trade is carried on by means of the Kennet and Avon Canal. Here are 65 almshouses. Two battles were fought near this town between Charles I. and the parliament in 1643 and 1644. It is seated on the Kennet, 20 m. S. of Oxford and 56 W. of London.

Newburyport, p.t. Essex Co. Mass. on the Mer

rimaca near its mouth. It is one of the handsomest towns in the United States, and is built on a sloping bank of the river, with regular streets and handsome houses. It extends a m. along the river, and has 7 churches, 2 banks, 2 insurance offices, and 2 newspapers. An elegant chain bridge crosses the river from the centre of the town. It had formerly a very active commerce, but it is now much declined. A fire in 1811 destroyed between two and three hundred buildings in the most compact part of the town, and the spot still remains in ruins. Ship building is carried on here, with some West India and coasting trade and fisheries. Here is also a manufacture of hosiery. The tomb of Whitefield the celebrated preacher may be seen in the Federal street church in this town, where he died in 1760. Newburyport is 32 m. N. E. Boston, 24 N. Salem, 24 S. W. Portsmouth. Lat. 42. 49. N., long. 70. 47. W. Pop. 6,388.

Newcastle, a town of Wales, in Caermarthenshire. It had a fine castle, now in ruins; and is seated on the Tivy, 229 m. W. N. W. of London.

Newcastle, a town of Ireland, in the county of Dublin, 10 m. W. S. W. of Dublin.

Newcastle under Lyme, a borough in Staffordshire, Eng. with a considerable manufacture of hats. The throwing of silk is a very considerable branch of trade, and here are also a cotton mill, tanneries, malt concerns, &c., and in the neighbourhood are some iron works. The villages around are entirely occupied with the manufactures of porcelain, stone-ware, &c. The principal streets are broad, well paved, and lighted with gas, and the general aspect of the town is much improved of late years. It stands on a branch of the Trent, 15 m. N. by W. of Stafford and 149 N. N. W. of London.

Newcastle upon Tyne, a borough and sea-port in Northumberland, Eng. It is situate among steep hills on the Tyne, which is here a fine and deep river, so that ships of 300 and 400 tons burden may safely come up to the town, though the large colliers are stationed at Shields. The haven is so secure that vessels, when they have passed Tyne-mouth Bar are in no danger either from storms or shallows. The town rises on the N. bank of the river, where the streets upon the ascent are exceedingly steep. Many of the houses are built of stone; but some of timber, and the rest of brick. Through this town went part of the wall which extended from sea to sea, and was built by the Romans to defend the Britons against the incursions of the Picts, after all their trained youth had been drawn from the kingdom to recruit the armies of their conquerors. The castle, which is old and ruinous overlooks the whole town. The exchange, churches, and other public buildings, are elegant; and the quay for landing goods is long and large. Here are a surgeon's hall; a large hospital, built by the contribution of the keel-men, for the maintenance of the poor of their fraternity; and several charitable foundations. Newcastle is situated in the centre of the collieries, which have for centuries supplied London, all the eastern, and most of the midland and southern parts of the kingdom with coal. This trade has been the source of great opulence to Newcastle, which, besides, exports large quantities of lead, salt, salmon, butter, tallow, and grindstones; and imports wine and fruit from the S. of Europe, and timber, iron hemp, &c., from the Baltic and Norway. Ships are sent hence to the Greenland fishery. It also possesses manufactures of steel, iron, and woollen cloth; and in the town and vicinity are several glass-houses. The first charter which was granted to the townsmen for digging coal was by Henry III., in 1239; but, in 1306, the use of coal for fuel was prohibited in London, by royal proclamation, chiefly because it injured the sale of wood for fuel, great quantities of which were then growing about that city, but this interdiction did not long continue, and we may consider coal as having been dug and exported from this place for more than 400 years. A handsome stone bridge of nine arches connects this town with the ancient borough of Gateshead. It was erected in 1781, in place of the old one which was carried away by an extraordinary flood in 1771. Newcastle was visited by the pestilential cholera in 1831. It is 272 N. by W. of London. Long. 1. 14. W., lat. 54. 57. N.

New England, the name applied to the northeastern parts of the American Union, comprising the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. This territory extends from 41. to 47. 20. N. lat. and from 66. 49. to 73. 45. W. long. and is bounded N. W. and N. by Canada, E. by New Brunswick and the Ocean: S. by the Ocean, and W. by New York. It contains about 63,000 sq. m. The surface of the country is infinitely varied, and presents the greatest diversity of beautiful scenery. It is traversed by several extensive mountain ranges which may be considered as extensions or branches of the great Apalachian chain: these are the White, Green and Tagkanuc Mountains which see. Rivers and small streams are abundant, and few countries in the world are better watered; the largest are the Connecticut, Penobscot, Merrimack, Kennebec, Androscoggin, and Saco. The climate exhibits great extremes of heat and cold. In most parts the ground is covered with snow for several months in winter, and all the rivers are frozen. Abundance of rain falls in spring, summer and autumn, and droughts are very rare. There is every variety of soil; the river alluvions are very rich, but most of the other soils are stony, and on the whole the country cannot generally be called fertile. Notwithstanding this, no part of the United States is so well cultivated, and the skill and industry of the New England farmers have made the country like a garden. The various articles of cultivation will be found enumerated under the heads of the several states. Cattle are raised in great numbers no part of the country offers finer grazing lands. Grass and maize are the staple productions in all parts.

New England is the most densely peopled section of the United States, and has been the chief nursery from which the western states were peopled. The greater portion of the commerce of the Union, and nearly all the fisheries, are carried on by the shipping of New England. A spirit of adventure, activity, zeal and foresight are characteristic of the people. They are ingenious, inquisitive, shrewd, calculating, persevering and industrious. The population is homogeneous and almost entirely of English descent. The settlement of the Puritans at Plymouth in Massachusetts was the foundation of all the New England States.

Newenham, Cape, a rocky point of considerable height, on the W. coast of N. America, forming the N. extremity of a vast bay called Bristol Bay, of which the promontory of Alaska is the S. boundary. It was discovered by Cook in 1778. Long. 162. 24. W., lat. 58. 42. N.

Newent, a town in Gloucestershire, Eng., seated on a branch of the Severn, 8 m. N. W. of Gloucester and 112 W. N. W. of London.

Newfoundland, an island on the E. coast of N. America, between 47. and 52. N. lat. It was discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1496; and after many disputes with the French it was ceded to the English in 1713. Its form is triangular; the N. point is separated from Labrador by the strait of Bellisle, and from this apex it is 350 m. in length to the base, which is 300 in breadth. It is a mountainous, woody country, and very cold, being covered with snow five months in the year. The settlements of the British are chiefly confined to the harbours, the country near Placentia, and along the bays E. towards Cape Raze and hence to Cape Buena Vista. In the fishing season, which begins in May and ends in September it is resorted to by at least 100,000 people, on account of the great fishing-banks to the S. E. of the island; for here they cure the cod, which is carried not only to England, but to the Mediterranean and the W. Indies. Within a few years Newfoundland has rapidly increased in population and industry. In 1789 the number of inhabitants was 25,000; it is now estimated at 75,000. The cutting down of wood still furnishes a large portion of employment during the winter: the smallest kind used for fuel, is drawn by their large dogs trained up and harnessed for that purpose. There is great plenty of game, fish and fowl, but very little corn, fruit, or cattle.

New Hampshire, one of the New England States, bounded N. by Lower Canada; E. by Maine, S. by Massachusetts and W. by Vermont. It extends from 42. 41. to 45. 11. N. lat. and from 70. 40. to 72. 28. W. long., 168 m. in length from N. to S. and 90 in breadth; containing 9,491 sq. miles. This state is inland with the exception of 18 miles of sea-coast on the east. It is traversed from N. to S. by a chain of mountains called the White Mountain range. The name of the White Mountains is more strictly applied to the elevations in the northern part of the state, which are the highest mountains in the United States, east of the Mississippi. See White Mountains. Farther south, this range presents some high eminences, as Monadnock, Kearsarge and Mooselock. This is the most mountainous state in the union and for its great variety of beautiful scenery has been called the Switzerland of America. Hardly any of the surface is even except a small tract upon the coast. The streams which water this state are numerous. The Connecticut washes the whole western boundary: the Merrimack rises here and has the greater part of its course within the state. The Saco rises in this state and passes into Maine. The Piscataqua is the only considerable stream which belongs wholly to New Hampshire. Many beautiful lakes are scattered about in different parts and supply the numerous rivers with their water. The largest is Winipisiogee which flows into the Merrimack; it is above 20 miles long and 10 wide, and exhibits some of the most delightful scenery in the world. See Winipisiogee. The others are Squam, Sunapee and Ossipee lakes, which See.

The climate of New Hampshire is salubrious but the winters are severe; deep snows occur in winter, and furious winds prevail among the mountains; in the northern part, the snow lies till May. The summer and autumn are pleasant, and throughout the year the fair days are to the cloudy as three to one. A great part of the state is covered with forests which furnish abundant supplies of timber such as oak, maple, beech, hemlock, walnut, white pine, fir, elm, cherry, ash, poplar, hornbeam, birch, locust, &c. The sugar maple is one of the most valuable trees in the world. It grows here sometimes to the diameter of 5 or 6 feet. In the spring the trunk is tapped a few feet from the ground and the sap drawn out; this is practised only for a season of 4 or 5 weeks, when the trees are frozen at night and thawed in the day: at no other time will the sap run freely. When the buds swell, the sap ceases to flow. The liquor is then simply boiled down and poured into pans where the sugar crystallizes.

The larger trees will yield 5 gallons of sap in a day and 15 pounds of sugar in a season. In this state and the adjoining parts of Vermont the manufacture of this sugar is carried on to a considerable extent.

The mineral products are iron, copper, plumbago, manganese, soapstone, and limestone. The soil is generally susceptible of cultivation, and on the borders of the rivers it is very rich. The mountainous tracts afford good pasturage. The articles of culture are maize, wheat, rye, oats, barley, flax, potatoes and pulse. Hay is produced abundantly. Cattle, and the products of the dairy form important articles of exportation. Domestic manufactures are common in all parts, and there are large manufacturing establishments at Dover and Somersworth. Most of the export trade goes to the States of Maine and Massachusetts. The foreign imports in 1828 amounted to 299,849 dollars; the exports of domestic produce to 115,947 dollars; the shipping amounted to 26,253 tons. The fisheries employ 60 or 70 sail, and take about 40,000 quintals of cod and pollock, and 6,000 barrels of mackerel yearly. Portsmouth is the only sea-port, except a few small coves for fishing craft. The Isles of Shoals, which See, lie upon this coast.

New Hampshire is divided into 8 counties, and 220 towns. The capital is Concord. The other principal towns are Portsmouth, Exeter, Dover, Amherst, Haverhill, Hanover, Keene and Charlestown. The population of the state is 269,533. The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Representatives, the members of which are chosen yearly as well as the Governor and executive council. Elections are popular and suffrage is universal. Perfect toleration is allowed in religion; no citizen is taxed but by his own consent, for the support of any religious society. The Calvinistic Congregationalists have 125 ministers; the Unitarians 11; the Presbyterians 8; the Episcopalians 8; the Calvinistic Baptists 70; the Freewill Baptists 51; the Christians 17; the Methodists 71; the Quakers 15; the Universalists 20; the Shakers 2 and the Sandemanians 1. Education receives great care; common schools are supported by law. The larger Seminaries are Dartmouth College at Hanover and Phillips Academy at Exeter. New Hampshire was first settled at Dover and Portsmouth in 1623. It was for a time a part of Massachusetts, but has been a distinct government since 1741. The present constitution was established in 1792.

New Haven, a county of Connecticut. Pop. 43,848. New Haven is the capital.

New Haven, city, the capital of the above county and jointly with Hartford, the seat of government for Connecticut, stands on a bay opening into Long Island Sound. It occupies a low situation, surrounded by hills, and is regularly and handsomely built. The streets are wide and commodious, and the general aspect of the town is neat and elegant. In the centre is a large square planted with trees and fronted by the State House, the college buildings, several churches and other fine structures, constituting one of the finest public places in the country. The State House is one of the handsomest buildings in the United States.

Yale College, at this place, was founded in 1701. It has 15 instructors and 346 students. The libraries have 17,500 volumes, and the collection of minerals is the best in the country. The buildings are 4 for the dwellings of the students, a chapel, a laboratory and an observatory on the model of the Tower of the Winds at Athens. A law school is connected with the college. There are 3 vacations in January, May and September, of 12 weeks. Commencement is in September.

New Haven has considerable commerce, and its trade with the interior is assisted by the Farmington Canal, which extends from this place northward into Massachusetts. It is in lat. 41. 18. N., long. 72. 56. W., 76 m. N. E. New York, 34 S. W. Hartford, 134 S. W. Boston. Pop. 10,678.

New Jersey, one of the United States, bounded N. by New York, E. by the ocean, S. by Delaware Bay and W. by Pennsylvania. It extends from 39. to 41. 24. N. lat. and from 74. to 75. 29. W. long. It is 163 m. long from N. to S. and 50 m. in average breadth, and contains 8,300 sq. miles. A small portion in the North is mountainous, but the greater part of the state is level, and the southern portion is a flat sandy alluvion, in some parts marshy, but in general barren or producing only shrub oaks and pines. The Delaware washes the whole western limit of the state, and a part of the eastern boundary lies upon the Hudson. The other rivers are the Raritan, Passaic, Hackensack and Great Egg Harbour. The climate is milder than in the adjoining states of New York and Pennsylvania, and nearly the whole state lies open to the sea air. The soil of the northern part is good, both for agriculture and grazing. Fruit is abundant; the apple orchards are very numerous and produce great quantities of excellent cider. Wheat, rye, maize, buckwheat and garden stuffs are the chief articles of cultivation; considerable numbers of cattle are raised for exportation. The foreign commerce is carried on principally through the ports of New York and Philadelphia. The imports directly into the state amounted in 1829 to 786,247 dollars; the exports of domestic produce to 8,022 dollars; the shipping in 1828 amounted to 48,772 tons. The shad fishery is very productive, and constitutes a source of income to the state: there are also considerable oyster beds which are productive. There are some mines of copper and iron, but the state is not rich in minerals. Flourishing manufactures are carried on at Trenton, New York, Patterson and the neighbourhood: they consist of cotton, woolen, iron, copper, brass, nails, duck, hats, shoes, leather, &c.

The state is divided into 13 counties and 120 townships; the population is 320,769; of whom 3,446 are slaves. The capital is Trenton. The other principal towns are Trenton, Burlington, Bordentown, Princeton, New Brunswick, Newark, Elizabethtown and Amboy. The legislature, consists of a council and a House of Assembly, the members of which are chosen yearly. The governor is chosen yearly by the legislature. Voters must be resident one year and possess a property of 50 pounds. The most numerous religious sect are the Presbyterians, who have 85 churches; the Reformed Dutch have 28, the Baptist 34, and the Episcopalians 20 ministers. The state has a school fund yielding a yearly revenue of 22,000 dollars. There are colleges at Princeton and New Brunswick. This state is traversed by several canals and railroads. The Morris Canal extends from the Hudson at Powles-Hook opposite New York to Easton on the Delaware, 94 m.: it has a rise and fall of 890 feet by means of locks and inclined planes, at which the boats are drawn up by machinery. It passes by the towns of Newark, Paterson, and Dover, and crosses Passaic and Pompton rivers by aqueducts. The Delaware and Raritan Canal will extend from the Delaware at Lambertown below Trenton, to New Brunswick on the Raritan, 38 m.: it is 75 feet wide at the surface, and 7 feet deep and will probably be finished in 1833. The Camden and Amboy Railroad, is nearly completed and will extend from Camden on the Delaware, to Amboy, 61 m. The Paterson and Hudson River Railroad, will pass from Paterson to Jersey city, on the Hudson, 14 m. Two other railroads are projected, the West Jersey and the Elizabethtown and Somerville Railroads.

New Jersey was first settled by the Danes at Bergen, opposite New York, in 1624; the Dutch afterwards made settlements in the same neighbourhood. The Swedes settled on the Delaware in 1636 and the English in 1640. The whole coun try reduced by the English in 1664. Elizabeth-town was founded by them in 1665. The government underwent various mutations, and the state was for a time divided into East and West Jersey. At the revolution a single government was established which has continued to the present day. The constitution was formed in 1776.

New Orleans, a Parish of Louisiana. Pop. 46,310, the capital is the following.

New Orleans, city, the capital of Louisiana, stands on the Mississippi, 105 m. from its mouth by the windings of the stream and 90 in a direct line. The river here makes a considerable bend to the N. E. and the city occupies the north-western bank, although its situation is east of the general course of the stream. The site is low and marshy, which makes the place insalubrious, and in the summer most of the inhabitants remove from the city. It is regularly built and is composed of three divisions, the city proper and the faubourgs or suburbs of St. Marie and Marigny. In the city the houses are built in the French and Spanish style, and covered with white and yellow stucco. The faubourg St. Marie is built after the American fashion, and does not differ in appearance from one of the Atlantic cities. Here are a large catholic cathedral, a handsome presbyterian church, a French and English theatre, a college, a convent of Ursuline nuns, an orphan asylum, and many charitable institutions. The commerce of the city is very great, as it is the outport of all the states lying on the Mississippi and its waters. Here are sometimes 1,500 flat boats from the upper country loaded with all sorts of agricultural produce; 50 steamboats, are often counted at a time in the river. The foreign exports consist of all the various productions of the southern and western states, but the most important articles are sugar and cotton. The Canal Carondelet extends from the Mississippi at this place to Lake Pontchartrain 2 m. and affords a navigation for small vessels to the ocean. A railroad 4 1-2 m. in length also passes between the same places and joins the lake at an artificial harbour. Both these communications are perfectly straight and the variation of level on the railroad is only 16 inches.

The population of New Orleans is of a very miscellaneous character. Dissipation prevails to a high degree. Half the inhabitants are blacks or mulattoes, and there are more French than Americans. The neighbourhood is a swamp, and the soil on which the city is built is so spongy that water rises at a few feet below the surface, and the buildings have no cellars. With all these disadvantages added to the unhealthiness of the spot, it continues rapidly to increase, and will doubtless soon become one of the most important commercial cities in the world. It was founded by the French in 1717. The British landed an army for the purpose of attacking it in 1814 but were totally defeated by General Jackson, a few miles below the city on the 8th of January 1815.

Newport, p.t. one of the chief towns in Rhode Island. It stands near the southern extremity of the island which gives its name to the state, upon a harbour formed by the entrance of the main channel of Narraganset Bay. This is one of the finest harbours in the world, lying close to the sea, and always accessible; the entrance is defended by several strong forts. Newport formerly enjoyed a very active commerce, but this has greatly declined, and the town has a decayed look. The legislature of the state sit here occasionally, and many people resort hither in summer for the purity and mildness of the air. Here are 11 churches, and some manufactures of cotton and lace. Pop. 8,010.

New Year's Islands, a number of small islands near the N. coast of Staten Land, in lat. 54. 41. S., long. 64. 28. W.

New York, one of the United States, bounded N. by Lake Ontario and Lower Canada, E. by Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, S. by Pennsylvania and N. Jersey, S. W. and N. W. by Lakes Erie, and Ontario, and Canada. It extends from 40. 30. to 45. N. lat. and from 73. to 79. 55. W. long. It is 340 m. in length from E. to W. and 304 in breadth, and contains, including Long Island, 45,085 sq. m. This state is mountainous in the eastern part, where it is traversed by a branch of the Apalachian chain, called the Shawangunk ridge, different portions of which are known by the name of the Highlands, and Catskill Mountains. See Catskill. In the north-eastern part are the Peruvian Mountains, which lie around the sources of the Hudson, and separate the waters of Lake Champlain from those of the St. Lawrence.

The most of the western part is level, but on the borders of Pennsylvania are some hilly tracts. Parallel with Lake Ontario there runs an elevation called the Ridge, about 70 m. in length; it is not more than 30 feet above the surrounding country, and 100 feet in width, and extends from Niagara river to the Genesee. The mountains exhibit granite, gneiss, limestone and mica slate; the western and central districts are secondary, and the southern mostly transition. Iron, tin, lead, and plumbago are found in the mountainous parts; coal, gypsum and slate occur along the Hudson, with some native silver. Antimony and arsenic have also been discovered.

The eastern part is watered by the Hudson, which rises on the western side of Lake Champlain, and flows southerly to the sea at New York; the Mohawk, from the west, is its chief branch. The Genesee crosses the state from Pennsylvania and runs into L. Ontario. Black river and the Oswegatchie, water the northern parts; the Onondaga receives the waters of a number of small lakes toward the west, and discharges them into Lake Ontario: the head streams of the Susquehanna have their source in this state. A great extent of the north western limit is washed by Lakes Erie and Ontario; on the north-eastern border lies Lake Champlain, dividing it from Vermont, and in the same quarter is Lake George. In the west are the smaller lakes of Oneida, Skeneateles, Owasco, Cayuga, Seneca, Crooked, Canandaigua and Chataque, many of which are adorned with beautiful scenery.

The soil in a great part of the state is excellent; on the Mohawk are alluvial tracts of remarkable fertility: in the west are the Genesee flats which are no less rich. In the north it is clayey; about Albany are some tracts of sandy plain interspersed with marshes. The valleys have a rich black mould; along the Hudson in the southern part, the soil is gravelly with rich alluvial tracts. About one fourth of the land is under cultivation; wheat is the chief article of culture; maize, rye, barley, oats, flax, buckwheat, hemp, &c. are also raised. The climate of this great state is more diversified than perhaps that of any other in the union. The northern part feels the severity of a Canadian winter; the south has a climate comparatively mild. About Albany the winter begins toward the middle of December and ends early in March. Hay is cut early in July, and the maize ripens in September and October. The Hudson is frozen in winter.

This state abounds in mineral springs, the most celebrated of which are in the neighbourhood of Saratoga, which See. There are in the western part, many which discharge inflammable air. See Burning Springs. Salt springs are also common, and salt is manufactured in great abundance at various places. See Salina. The internal trade of the state is facilitated by many canals, the largest of which unites the Hudson with Lake Erie. See Erie Canal. The Northern canal connects Lake Champlain with the Hudson, and is 63 m. in length. The Delaware and Hudson canal extends from Port Jervis, on the Delaware to the Hudson; it has a further extension to Honesdale, in Pennsylvania, and its whole length is 108 m. There are also canals which open a communication between the Mohawk and Lake Ontario through Oneida Lake. Four railroads are in a process of construction. The Mohawk and Hudson Railroad, between the Hudson at Albany and the Mohawk at Schenectady 15 miles—the Canajoharie and Catskill Railroad from Canajoharie on the Erie canal to Catskill on the Hudson 74 m.;—the Hudson and Delaware Railroad, from Newburgh on the Hudson to the Delaware;—the Troy and Bennington Railroad, from Troy on the Hudson to Bennington in Vermont. These improvements with the admirable position of the great outport of the state at the mouth of the Hudson, have given the trade of New York an unexampled activity, and it has already become one of the most flourishing states in the Union. The commerce is chiefly transacted through the single sea-port of New York; but there is also much trade by the way of the lakes. The imports into the state in 1828 were valued at 32,719,644 dollars; the exports of domestic produce at 13,920,627 dollars; total exports 23,834,137 dollars. The shipping in the same year amounted to 354,771 tons. Thus in amount of foreign trade New York surpasses every state in the Union, although in tonnage of shipping Massachusetts is superior.

The manufactures consists of cotton, woolen, cloths, iron, salt, paper, glass, leather, &c. The chief establishments are at the following places. At Columbiaville near Hudson, are 11 factories producing yearly 16,240,000 yards of calico, with carpeting and flannels;—at Matteawan near Fishkill are manufactured broadcloths unsurpassed for fineness in the country;—at Catskill carpeting and paper;—at Walden are produced yearly 140,000 yards of flannel; 360,000 of sheeting and 30,000 of broadcloth;—at Schenectady are made yearly 400,000 yards of cotton cloth, 30,000 lbs. of yarn, with carpeting, satin and paper. There are also manufactures of cotton, iron, &c. at Ramapo, Albany, Troy, and many other places. The yearly value of the manufactures without reckoning domestic fabrics is estimated as follows, cotton 3,000,000 dollars; woolen 3,000,000; iron 4,000,000; paper 500,000; hats 3,000,000; boots and shoes 5,000,000; leather 3,000,000; window glass 200,000. The domestic manufactures in 1825 amounted to nearly 5,000,000 dollars.

The state is divided into 8 districts and 56 counties. The towns and cities are 762. The population is 1,913,508 of whom 46 are slaves. There are also about 5,000 Indians in the western parts. The capital is Albany. The other large towns are New York, Brooklyn, Troy, Hudson, Poughkeepsie, Newburgh, Rochester and Buffalo. The legislature consists of a Senate and an Assembly; the senators are chosen for 4 years, one fourth of the numbers being renewed annually, and the members of the Assembly for one year. The Governor and Lt. Governor are chosen for 2 years and are elected by the highest number of votes given; although less than a majority. The clergy are excluded from office. Elections are popular and suffrage is universal. The most numerous religious sect are the Presbyterians, who have 587 churches; the Baptists have 539; the Episcopalians 120 ministers; the Lutherans 27, and the Reformed Dutch 54 churches. Education is provided for by a Literary Fund producing yearly 6,000 dollars, which sum is divided among the incorporated academies. There is also a common school fund; and 900,000 dollars raised from this source and from taxes, are annually appropriated for the support of public schools. There are in the state 36 incorporated academies and 8,000 common schools which afford instruction to 400,000 children. There are 4 colleges in the state, at New York, Schenectady, Clinton, and Geneva.

New York was first settled by the Dutch, who established themselves at Albany, and on the island of Manhattan, where the city of New York now stands, about 1612. The English, disputed their claim to the country, and Charles II. made a grant of it to his brother the Duke of York. A strong force was sent against the colony, and the Dutch unable to offer resistance, peaceably submitted. The name of the colony was changed from New Netherlands to that of New York. It passed again into the hands of the Dutch for a short period, but finally became established under the English government. It was the theatre of some of the most important military operations during the American revolution, and the territory was not wholly abandoned by the British till the conclusion of peace. The present constitution of the state was established in 1821.

New York, city, in the above state, the chief city in the western world for population, wealth and commerce, is situated in the south-western extremity of the state, upon a wide harbour at the mouth of the Hudson, communicating with Long Island Sound and the ocean by two entrances. The city stands on the southern point of the island of Manhattan which is washed on one side by the Hudson, and on the other by the strait called East River, which separates it from Long Island, and affords a navigable communication between New York harbour and Long Island Sound. The harbour extends 9 m. S. of the city to the sea. The first settlement was made at the southern extremity, consequently that portion of the city is composed of narrow, crooked, inconvenient streets, and unsightly old buildings; but the more modern parts, and especially those which have grown up within 20 years, are regular and commodious. The finest street is Broadway, which traverses the whole city in a straight line from N. to S. being 3 m. in length and 80 feet in breadth; it is occupied chiefly by shops and elegant public buildings, and few streets in the world equal it for the splendor, bustle and fashion it exhibits. The Battery is an enclosed promenade on the shore at the southern extremity of the city; it is planted with trees, and though not extensive, is pleasant, much frequented, and offers a delightful view of the harbour.

The Park is a triangular enclosure of 11 acres in the centre of the city; upon one side of this stands the City Hall, an elegant structure with a front of white marble; it is 216 feet long and 106 broad, and is one of the finest buildings in the country. The Merchants' Exchange in Wall street is handsomely built of white marble. The United States Branch Bank is also a fine marble structure. St. Paul's Chapel is esteemed one of the finest buildings in the city; its spire is 234 feet high. St. John's Chapel has a spire 240 feet in height, and is the most costly church in the city, having been built at the expense of 200,000 dollars. St. Patrick's Cathedral, a Roman Catholic edifice, is the largest of all the churches, and is of stone, 120 feet long and 80 wide. There are more than 100 additional churches, some of them very costly. Trinity Church is a Gothic edifice of stone, and belongs to the oldest and richest episcopal establishment in America, possessing a property to the amount of several millions of dollars.

Columbia College at New York, was founded in 1757, and till the Revolution, was called King's College. It has a President and 5 professors. The libraries contain 14,000 volumes. The students are 124. This institution is well endowed. Commencement is in August; there is but one vacation of about two months immediately afterward. The college building is of stone, stuccoed, and contains lodgings for the professors, with a chapel, library, museum, lecture rooms, &c. but the students do not reside in it. The grounds attached to the college are extensive.

The New York Institution comprises a large edifice, 260 feet in length, in the rear of the City Hall, and occupied by the Literary and Philosophical Society, the Historical Society, the Academy of fine Arts, the Lyceum of Natural History, the Museum, and the Deaf and Dumb Asylum. The Historical Society have a library of 10,000 volumes. The New York Society Library in Nassau street has 20,000. The State Prison is on the eastern bank of the Hudson, in the upper part of the city, and is a large stone building, enclosed by a spacious yard. The almshouse is at Bellevue, on East river, and comprises three stone buildings, the largest of which is 320 feet in length. The Hospital is a large and well regulated establishment, and has a library of 4,000 volumes.

The city rises with a moderate ascent from both rivers. The view in approaching it by the Narrows from the sea is particularly fine. The bay contains many small islands, with forts and castles upon them, and the lofty spires of the city are visible at a great distance. The water is everywhere deep and the current rapid; it has not been frozen over for 50 years. The commerce of the city is very great, as may be gathered from the following items. During the year 1830, there arrived 1,489 vessels from foreign ports; sailed for foreign ports 1,138; entered coastwise 1,332; cleared coastwise 3,474; total arrived and departed 7,433. The revenue collected at the custom house in 1829 was 13,052,676 dollars; being more than half the whole revenue of the United States from foreign commerce. The city expenditure by the municipal government in 1830, was 1,033,419 dollars. The population by the census of 1830, was 207,021 in the city and county which take in the whole island of New York. Brooklyn, on the Long Island shore of East river, is properly a suburb of the city, and contains a population of 15,396.

Packets sail from New York, to Liverpool and London every week; to Havre every 10 days; and to Hull, Greenwich, Belfast, Vera Cruz, Carthagena, and all the chief ports of the United States at different times. Fifty steam-boats constantly pass between New York and the towns on the Hudson, Long Island Sound and other waters in the neighbourhood. There are 61 banks in the city, 28 insurance companies; 463 schools; 40 bookstores; 450 lawyers; 98 clergymen; 50 auctioneers; 300 oyster shops; 56 lottery offices

3,600 licensed groceries and taverns; 2,380 licensed cartmen and porters; 2,110 paupers in the almshouse. The real estate of the city is valued at 87,603,389, dollars, the personal estate at 37,684,938 dollars; total, 127,288,518.

Most of the periodicals are newspapers; the whole number is 48, eleven of which are daily. The bookselling trade is thriving, and there are some establishments, in which the republication of English works is carried on upon a very large scale. One of these has issued between 4 and 500,000 volumes in a year. The number of public schools does not exceed a dozen; their annual expense to the city is 25,995 dollars. This deficiency however, in the means of common education, is in some degree made up by a large number of charity schools. The Lyceum of Natural History, and the New York Athenaeum, are respectable associations for the promotion of science and literature. The Chamber of Commerce is an incorporated body of merchants, who devote themselves to the study of mercantile affairs. Many other institutions for various objects we can only mention by name, as the institution for the Deaf and Dumb; the Horticultural Society; the National Academy of the arts of Design; the Asylum for the Insane, and many charitable institutions. The government of the city is composed of a Mayor, 10 Aldermen, and 10 Assistants.

The rapid increase in population and trade which New York has experienced within a few years, and its commanding position for a commercial mart, added to the increasing facilities for internal navigation, and the growing prosperity of the back country, must secure it a permanent superiority over all other cities in the United States. Its population exhibits a great diversity of character. The ancient Dutch settlers have left traces of their national manners among their descendants, and the number of foreigners constantly residing here is very great. The most numerous are the Irish, who are estimated at 20,000. The French and Spanish are next in number. The city was founded by the Dutch in 1614, and was by them called New Amsterdam. It was taken by the English in 1664, and received the name of New York. It is in lat. 40. 42. 40. N. long. 74. 0. 45. W., 210 m. S. W. Boston, 90 N. E. Philad., 227 N. E. Washington, 140 S. Albany, and 390 S. Montreal.

Ngan King Fou, a city of China, capital of the western part of the province of Kiang Nan.

Ngan lo Fou, a large city of China in the province of Hou Quang. 420 m. W. by S. of Nankin.

Niagara, a river of North America, connecting Lakes Erie and Ontario. It is 35 m. in length and flows northerly; about midway between the two lakes it separates into two channels forming Grand Island. A short distance below the union of these channels are the celebrated falls of Niagara universally allowed to be the grandest cataract in the world. Half a mile above the falls, the river is a furious rapid which sweeps away to certain destruction every thing involved in it; the river is here three quarters of a mile broad, and from this point it rushes down with increased velocity to the fall where it leaps in one immense mass down a perpendicular precipice 160 feet in depth, with a roar that may be heard 40 miles. The cataract forms an irregular semicircle, the deepest hollow of which is called the Horse Shoe Fall, and is on the Canada side. At the brink of the fall stands a small island, called Goat Island, which breaks the great sheet of water as it rushes over the precipice, but the waters unite again before they reach the bottom. A bridge is thrown across the falls from the American side to the island. On the British side a few yards below is a projection called Table Rock, commanding a magnificent view of the falls. From this rock a spiral staircase leads down to the foot of the cataract where visitors may pass under the fall between the sheet of water and the rock. The path leads far under the excavated bank of the river, which in some places forms a roof overhanging 40 feet. The fall of such an immense mass of water, produces violent whirls in the air, and the spray is driven out with such force that no one can approach the edge of the cataract without being drenched to the skin. It is difficult even to draw a breath here, and in entering this tremendous cavern there is danger of being blinded by the strong driving showers of spray; the greatest distance to which it is possible to penetrate within the sheet of water is 150 feet. The banks of the river for several miles below the falls are perpendicular precipices of rock, and there is reason to believe that the cataract was formerly much farther down the river, the rock having gradually worn away to the present spot. A cloud of spray is continually rising from the foam of waters and exhibiting in the sunshine a brilliant rainbow. The island upon the summit is about a mile in circumference, and is covered with trees. In summer crowds of visitors are continually resorting hither from all parts of the world; and there are many public houses in the neighbourhood for their accommodation.

Nias, a small island, near the W. coast of the island of Sumatra. Long. 97. 0. E., lat. 0. 40. N.

Nibe, a town of Denmark, in N. Jutland, 9 m. W. S. W. of Alburg.

Nibiano, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Parma, 16 m. S. W. of Piacenza.

Nicaragua, a province of Guatemala, bounded on the N. by Honduras, E. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. E. by Costa Rica, and S. W. by the Pacific Ocean. It is 400 m. from E. to W. and 120 from N. to S. It is well watered by lakes and rivers, and produces plenty of sugar, cochineal, and fine chocolate. Leon de Nicaragua is the capital.

Nicasagua, a lake in the foregoing province

350 th. in circumference. It is interspersed with islands, and abounds in fishes, but is infested with crocodiles. The S. W. extremity is only a few leagues from the Pacific Ocean, and the S. E. end communicates with the Atlantic Ocean by the river St. Juan.

Nicaragua, a city of the foregoing province, situate at some distance S. W. of the lake, and near the mouth of a river, on the Pacific Ocean, 120 m. S. E. of Leon de Nicaragua. Long. 86. 10. W., lat. 11. 15. N.

Nicaria, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, between Samos and Tinn, anciently called Icaria. It is 50 m. in circumference, and full of rocks. Long. 26. 30. E., lat. 37. 40. N.

Nicastro, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, with an ancient castle, 17 m. S. S. E. of Cosenza.

Nice, a county of Sardinia, bounded by the Var, the Maritime Alps, the territories of Genoa, and the Mediterranean. It was anciently an appendage of Provence in France, but afterwards passed to the king of Sardinia. It is 36 m. long, and 18 broad; and contains about 100 000 inhabitants.

Nice, an ancient, handsome, and considerable town, on the confines of France and Italy, capital of the foregoing province. It has a strong citadel built on a rock, and on the W. it is fortified with a wall and ditch. On the E. side of the rock is the harbour, called Limpinia, from a small river that runs into it. The inhabitants export oil, silk, wine, cordials, rice, oranges, lemons, and all sorts of dried fruits. It was taken by the French in 1792, retaken by the Austrians in 1800, but evacuated in a week afterwards. It is very agreeably situated, 4 m. from the mouth of the Var, 63 S. by W. of Turin, and 83 E. of Aix.

Nice, a city of Natolia. See Ionic.

Nishaburg, a town of Persia, famous for a mine of turquoise stone in its neighbourhood. It is 37 m. S. of Mesched.

Nicholas, a county of the W. district of Virginia. Pop. 3,349. A county of Kentucky. Pop. 8,832. Carlisle is the capital.

Nicholasville, p.t. Jessamine Co. Ken. 30 m. S. E. of Frankfort.

Nicholas, St., one of the largest and most pleasant of the Cape Verde Islands, between St. Lucia and St. Jago. It is 75 m. in length; and is the residence of the bishop of the isles. Long. 14. 10. W., lat. 16. 32. N.

Nicholas, St., a town of France, in the department of Meurthe, with a handsome church, to which pilgrims formerly resorted. It is seated on the Meurthe, 7 m. S. E. of Nancy.

Nicholas, St., Mole, a town, harbour, and cape, at the N. W. extremity of St. Domingo, commanding the strait called the Windward Passage. The harbour is strongly fortified by nature and art; and ships of any burden may ride at anchor in the basin, even during a hurricane. It was taken by the English aided by the French royalists, in 1793, but evacuated in 1796. Long. 73. 30. W., lat. 19. 49. N.

Nicholas Island, a small island on the N. coast of the island of Cuba. Long. 79. 40. W., lat. 33. 50. N.

Nicobar Islands, a group of 19 islands on the E. side of the bay of Bengal. They are almost entirely uncultivated; but the cocoa-nut, the meliori or lorum (a kind of bread-fruit), and other tropical fruits grow spontaneously; there are also yams and sweet potatoes, and the edible birds' nests so much esteemed in China. Dogs and hogs are the principal animals. The inhabitants are tall and well proportioned, with black eyes, black lank hair, and dark copper-coloured skins. They live in little huts, having no towns, and go quite naked, except a cloth about the waist with a small string hanging down behind. These islands extend northward, from the N. point of Sumatra. The largest, which gives name to the rest, is 25 m. long and 10 broad. Its extremity is in long. 94. 3. E., lat. 6. 39. N.

Nicojack Cave, in Georgia, is situated in an eminence called Racoon Mountain. Its mouth is 50 feet high and 160 feet wide. Niger, a celebrated river of Africa, rising near Mount Lamba in the country of the Soulimas, on the northern declivities of the Kong Mountains. No geographical problem ever presented a more fruitful subject for conjecture, doubt, hypothesis, and research, both critical and experimental, than the course and termination of this mysterious river. Until the travels of Mungo Park in 1796 it was even disputed whether it flowed East or West. This traveller although he established the fact of its easterly direction, and proceeded some distance along its banks, yet was unable to make any further discovery respecting its termination. Attempts made by other travellers were followed by no better success, and Park in his second journey into the country lost his life. Many authors were of opinion that the river flowed into a great central lake, and had no communication with the sea; others sought for arguments to show that its waters were swallowed up by the sands of the desert; at one time the belief was very prevalent that it flowed a great distance south and ran into the ocean by the river Zaire or Congo; the British government even despatched an expedition under Captain Tuckey to proceed up the Congo and make discoveries, but nothing satisfactory was the result. The travels of Laing, Denham, and Clapperton failed to settle the long disputed point, and an impenetrable cloud of mystery continued to hang over the subject till 1830 when the grand discovery was effected by Richard and John Lander, the former of whom had been the servant of Clapperton in his African travels, and who attended him on the expedition in which he lost his life.

These travellers in March 1830 penetrated into the country till they reached the Niger, and proceeded down the stream till they arrived at the Bight of Benin, a termination which had been fixed upon many years before by a German theorist named Reichard, although his reasoning was grounded upon false data. The Niger, or Quorra, or Joliba, for it is called by all these names, is thus ascertained to flow into the Atlantic ocean in about 5. N. lat. It discharges its waters by several channels, forming a great delta like the Nile, Ganges and Mississippi; the channel by which the Landers arrived at the ocean, has been hitherto known as the river Nun, and the delta is 240 m. in extent along the coast, from the river Benin to that of Old Calabar; the inland extent of the delta is about the same, and the whole territory is intersected by various arms of the river, such as are called bayous on the lower course of the Mississippi. The banks of these streams are generally overflowed, and the land is covered with mangrove trees growing in the water; the whole surface is low, flat and swampy.

For the first half of its course the Niger flows in a N. E. course; between 15. and 16. N. lat. it turns to the E. and afterwards pursues a southerly direction to the sea. It flows by the cities of Sego, Jenne, Tombuctoo, Boussa, Yaoori, Nyffe, Rabba, Egga, and Kianee, at which last place the delta commences. It receives from the N. E. a branch called the Tahadda, which the Landers saw in a state of inundation 2 or 3 miles in width. It is now very evident that neither Herodotus, Pliny, or Ptolemy ever had any knowledge of this river, and that the name of Niger ought no longer to be applied to it. Its most common name in Africa is the Quorra.

Nigono, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Modena, 22 m. S. W. of Modena.

Nigritia. See Negroland.

Nile, a great river of Africa, which, according to the most authentic accounts, rises in the mountains of the Moon. It runs through the lake Dembea, then makes a circuit towards its source, which it leaves 25 m. to the E., and enters into Nubia, through which country it takes a circuitous course, and forms some considerable cataracts. It then flows almost directly S. through Egypt, till it arrives at Cairo; and a little below that city it divides into two great branches, which with the Mediterranean Sea, forms the island called Delta. The ancients reckoned eleven mouths of the Nile, of which seven were considerable; but at present there are only two that are at all times navigable, and those are at Rosetta and Damietta. The fertility of Egypt depends upon the overflowing of the Nile, which takes place regularly every year, from the 15th of June to the 17th of September, when it begins to decrease. It is caused by the periodical rains that fall between the tropics, and more particularly in Abyssinia, which is full of high mountains. In Cairo there is a ca nal called Khalis, which is opened when the water is high enough; thence it is conveyed into reservoirs and cisterns, and is afterwards distributed into the fields and gardens, as occasion requires.

Norfolk, a county of England, 77 m. long and 45 broad; bounded on the N. and E. by the German Ocean, S. E. and S. by Suffolk, and W. by Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire. It contains 1,094,400 acres, is divided into 33 hundreds and 600 parishes, has one city and 22 market towns, and sends 12 members to parliament. The products vary according to the soil and situation. The lighter arable lands produce barley in great plenty; wheat is cultivated in the strongest soils; and turnips are grown here in great quantities; buck-wheat is also grown on the light soils, and used for feeding swine and poultry. The fenny parts yield great quantities of butter, which is sent to London under the name of Cambridge butter. The sheep are a hardy small breed, much valued for their mutton. Poultry of all kinds are very plentiful, and the turkeys are reared here to a larger size than elsewhere; rabbits are extremely numerous on the sandy heaths; and there is abundance of game, especially of pheasants. The principal manufactures of the county are silks, bombazines, crapes, camlets, &c. It is watered by the Great Ouse, Nen, Little Ouse, Waveney, Yare, Bure, and some smaller streams. Norwich is the capital.

Norfolk Island, an island in the S. Pacific, lying E. of New S. Wales, and settled by a colony of convicts, subordinate to that government. It was discovered in 1774 by captain Cook, who found it uninhabited, except by birds. It is very hilly, but some of the valleys are tolerably large. Mount Pitt, the only remarkable hill, is 12,000 feet high. The whole island is covered by a thick forest, but has not much underwood; and the principal timber tree is the pine, which is very useful in buildings, and seems to be durable. The island is supplied with many streams of good water, which abounds with many fine eels. The cliffs round the coast are 240 feet high, quite perpendicular; and anchorage is safe all round the island, on taking the lee side; but there is no harbour, and from the heavy seas which constantly beat upon the shore, there is great difficulty in approaching it, in consequence of which the settlers are encouraged to remove to Port Dalrymple or the Derwent River, in New Holland, where the greater part of the military and convicts were removed in 1805. Long. 163. 12. E., lat. 20. 5. S.

Norham, a village in Durham, Eng. Its castle, on the edge of a rock above the Tweed, has been many times taken and destroyed by the Scotch, and as often rebuilt by the English. 6 m. S. W. of Berwick.

Normandy, a former province of France, now forming the departments of Calvados, Eure, Manche, Orne, and Lower Seine. The Normans, a people of Denmark and Norway, having entered France under Rollo, Charles the Simple ceded this country to them in 912, which from that time was called Normandy. Rollo, the first duke held it as a fief of the crown of France, as did several of his successors after him. In 1066, William the 7th duke having conquered England, it became a province of that country, till it was lost in the reign of king John, and re-united to the crown of France. It is one of the most fertile provinces in France, and abounds in all things except wine, which defect is supplied by cider and perry. It contains iron, copper, and a great number of rivers and harbours.

Northampton, a borough and the capital of Northamptonshire, Eng. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, and had a castle, of which there are still some remains. In 1675 it was almost entirely destroyed by fire, but was soon rebuilt. The houses are uniformly built of freestone and chiefly slated; the streets are regular, and the town is lighted with gas. It has 4 churches, 8 dissenting meeting houses, a capacious market-place, a good free school, a general infirmary, and a county gaol on the principles of Mr. Howard. The principal manufacture consists of boots and shoes, chiefly for exportation. In the meadows below the town a battle was fought in 1460 between Henry VI. and the Yorkists in which the former was defeated and made prisoner. Two miles to the S. is a fine ancient Gothic structure called Queen's Cross, erected by Edward I., in memory of his queen Eleanor. Northampton is seated on the Nen, 30 m. S. E. of Coventry and 66 N. W. of London.

Northamptonshire, a county of England, 65 m long and 24 where broadest; bounded S. by Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire. In the N. E. part, near Peterborough, commences a fenny tract, extending to the Lincolnshire Wash. With this single exception, Northamptonshire is said to contain less waste ground, and more seats of the nobility and gentry, than any other county. Its greatest defect is a scarcity of fuel, which is but scantily supplied by its woods; and, though coal is brought by the river Nen, it is at a very dear rate. This county, however, possesses some considerable remains of its old forests, particularly those of Rockingham on the N. W., and of Salcey and Whittlebury on the S. Its products are, in general, the same with those of other farming counties; but it is peculiarly celebrated for grazing land. Wood for the dyers is cultivated here, but the country is not distinguished for manufactures.

Northfleet, a village in Kent, Eng. seated on the Thames, 2 m. W. of Gravesend. The church contains fragments of monuments as ancient as the 14th century. Vast quantities of lime are made here, and great numbers of extraneous fossils have been dug up.

Northleach, a town in Gloucestershire, Eng. seated near the source of the Lech, 25 m. E. of Gloucester and 81 W. by N. of London.

Northop, a village of Wales, in Flintshire, 3 m. S. E. of Flint; noted for its manufactures of coarse earthenware, firebricks, &c.

Northumberland, the most northern county of England. In the Saxon heptarchy it was a part of the kingdom of the Northumbrians, which contained also the counties of York, Lancaster, Durham, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and received its name from being situate N. of the Humber. It is of a triangular form, 64 m. in extreme length and 50 in extreme breadth; bounded on the E. by the German Ocean. The soil is various; the E. part is fruitful in most sorts of corn, with rich meadows on the banks of the rivers; but the W. part is mostly heathy and mountainous. The S. E. part abounds with thick seams of coal; and the S. W. angle has rich lead mines. Limestone and iron ore abound in various parts. Alnwick is the capital; but the largest town is Newcastle.

Northumberland Islands, a chain of islands in the S. Pacific, near the N. E. coast of New Holland. Long. 150. E., lat. 22. S.

Northumberland Strait, the S. part of the gulf of St. Lawrence, between the island of St. John and the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Northwich, a town in Cheshire, Eng. with a cotton manufacture, and considerable salt-works; seated on the Dan, at its junction with the Weaver, 20 m. N. E. of Chester and 174 N. W. of London.

Norton Sound, an inlet of the sea, on the W. coast of N. America, discovered by Cook in his last voyage. The entrance is between Cape Denbigh on the E. and Cape Danby on the W., about 70 m. distant, both lying in lat. 64. 30. N., and the latter in long. 162. 55. W.

North Carolina, one of the United States, bounded N. by Virginia, E. by the ocean, S. by the ocean and S. Carolina and W. by Tennessee. It extends from 33. 50. to 36. 30. N. lat. and from 75. 45. to 84. W. long. 435 m. in length from E. to W. and 180 in breadth. It contains 43,800 sq. m. Nearly all the state is level: in the west the Blue Ridge of mountains crosses the country from Virginia to S. Carolina. It is watered by the Chowan and Roanoke rivers which rise in Virginia and flows through this state into Albermarle Sound; by the Pamlico and Cape Fear rivers which flow to the sea in the eastern and southern parts, and the Yadkin which passes into S. Carolina. A number of low sandy islands are scattered along the coast and inclose several large sounds, as Pamlico, Albermarle and Currituck; yet the entrances to these, and the mouths of the rivers are obstructed with shoals, and there is not a good harbour in the state. The soil is to a great extent sandy and poor, with extensive swampy tracts; there are however, fertile districts here and there, and the banks of the rivers are generally productive. In the western parts the soil is much the best. The Great Dismal Swamp lies between this state and Virginia and covers a space of 150,000 acres. In its neighbourhood is another called the Little Dismal Swamp.

The mineral region of this state has lately attracted great attention. Mines of gold have been discovered which have already proved highly productive: these mines are not confined to the limits of North Carolina but extend into the adjoining states of Virginia, South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia and Alabama. They are computed to cover more than 1,000 sq. m. of surface. The mines in this state are very active and employ about 20,000 men. They are not sunk very deep but are wrought extensively in a horizontal direction. The gold is also found on the surface, in grains among the sand and gravel, and is obtained by washing the earth. The particles seldom exceed in size the head of a pin, although occasionally larger pieces are found, and in one instance a lump weighing 28 pounds was discovered. There are a great number of mills in this state for grinding the ore, which are driven by water or steam. The greater part of the gold is sent to Europe. The quantity afforded by all the mines is not known with any accuracy, although many exaggerated statements have been made respecting it, some of which state the amount as high as 5,000,000 dollars annually.

A great part of the country is covered with forests of pitch pine. In the plains of the low country, this tree is almost exclusively the natural growth of the soil. It much exceeds in height, the pitch pine of the Northern States. The tar, turpentine and lumber, afforded by this valuable tree, constitute one half the exports of the state. The moisture of the air, in the swampy regions, loads the trees with long, spongy moss, which hangs in clusters from the limbs, and gives the forest a singular appearance. The mistletoe is often found upon the trees of the interior. This state also produces several valuable medicinal roots, as ginseng, Virginia, and Seneca snakeroot, &c. The rich intervals are overgrown with canes, the leaves of which continue green through the winter, and afford good fodder for cattle.

The most common articles of culture are maize and wheat, to which the nature of the soil seems well adapted. Some attention is paid to cotton and rice. Tobacco is raised in the uplands, as well as most of the productions of the Middle States. Agricultural societies exist in different parts of the state, and sums of money are annually paid by the government for their assistance. Agriculture, however, is in a backward condition.

The produce of the interior is generally carried to the trading towns in Virginia and South Carolina for a market. Timber and plank, grain, flour and naval stores are the chief exports. The shipping of the state amounted in 1826, to 54,094 tons. The imports for the same period, were $3,347 dollars; the exports of domestic produce, 664,506 dollars.

In the mountainous parts of the west, the climate is temperate, and the air salubrious; this region is one of the most healthy in the country, and though the days in summer are hot, the nights are refreshed by cool breezes. In all the eastern parts, the climate is unhealthy, and intermittent fevers are common in summer and autumn. The inhabitants have a pale, yellowish, and bilious complexion. The winters are very mild. The wheat harvest takes place in the beginning of June; the maize harvest early in September.

North Carolina is divided into 62 counties. The population is 738,470, of whom 246,462 are slaves. Raleigh is the capital. The other large towns are Newbern, Wilmington and Fayetteville. The legislature is styled the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and a House of Commons. Each county chooses one senator and two representatives. The governor is chosen annually by the legislature, and is ineligible three years out of six. Voters for senators must be freeholders. The clergy are excluded from the legislature. The Baptists are the most numerous religious sect; they have 272 churches; the Presbyterians 126; the Lutherans 45; the Episcopalians 11; the United Brethren 4. The Methodists have 32 preachers, and there are a number of societies of Quakers. The state has a university at Chapel Hill, and a small literary fund, but which is not yet available for the purpose of education.

The first permanent settlements in North Carolina were made by fugitives and seceders from Virginia, between 1640 and 1650. The constitution was the work of the celebrated John Locke. The chief magistrate was called the Palatine, and there was an hereditary nobility, with the titles of Landgrave and Casique. The legislature was called a parliament. This constitution was found upon trial to be ill adapted to the character of the people, and it was abolished in 1693. This colony had been connected with that of South Carolina, till 1720, when they were separated, and the government of both was assumed by the king. This continued till the present constitution was established in 1776.

Norway, a country in the N. of Europe, belonging to Sweden, the most westerly part of the ancient Scandinavia. It is bounded on the W. and N. by the Northern Ocean, E. by Swedish Lapland and Sweden, and S. by the Cattegat extending from the Naze in lat. 57. 30., to the N. Cape in lat. 71. 10. Its breadth, which is very unequal, is from 40 to 280 m. It is naturally formed into two divisions, namely, Northern and Southern or Proper Norway, separated from each other by the small Swedish province of Herndahl. It is divided into the four governments of Aggerhuys, Christiania or Christiansand, Bergen, and Drontheim. From its rocky soil, and northern position, Norway is not populous in proportion to its extent. The number of inhabitants is calculated at 1,000,000, who like the Swiss mountaineers, are exceedingly attached to their country. In Norway, they have a particular code, called the Norway Law, compiled by Grieffefeld, at the command of Christian V., the great legislator of this country. By this law,—the palladium of Norway, the peasants are free-born. They possess much spirit and fire in their manner; are frank, open and undaunted, yet not insolent; never fawning, yet paying proper respect. Their principal mode of salute is by offering their hand; and, when they are given or paid any trifle, the peasants, instead of returning thanks by words, or by a bow, shake hands with great frankness and cordiality. The same causes which affect the population of Norway operate likewise on the state of tillage; for, although in some places vegetation is so quick that the corn is sown and out in six or seven weeks, yet the country does not produce sufficient corn for its own consumption. It is, however, exceedingly rich in pasture, and consequently produces much cattle. The horses are small, but strong, very active, and hardy. The fisheries, particularly on the W. coast, find employment and wealth for the natives, and supply the finest sailors for the Danish fleet. The principal fish are salmon, cod, ling, and whiting; their livers also yield train-oil; and the smallest are given as winter fodder to the cattle. The extensive forests of oak and pine produce timber, spars, beams, and planks, besides charcoal, turpentine, bark, fuel, and even manure; and the birch (the bark of which is used as a covering for the roofs of houses) not only supplies fuel, but also a kind of wine. The general exports are tallow, butter, dried fish, timber, planks, horses, horned cattle, silver, cobalt, alum, Prussian blue, copper, and iron. It abounds in lakes and rivers; the former so large that they appear like inlets of the sea; but the rivers are in general of a short course, except the Glommen. The mountains are numerous, and generally clothed with pines and firs; the grand Scandinavian chain, which runs from S. to N., is known by distinct appellations; the chief are the ridges of Langfial, Dofrafial, Kolen, and Severnoi. The wild animals are the bear, lynx, wolf, fox, and hare; but the most singular creature is the lemming, or Norwegian mouse, of a reddish colour, and about five inches long. These animals proceed in vast numbers from the ridge of Kolen to the sea, devouring every product of the soil in their course, and at last seem to devour each other.

Norway was formerly governed by its own hereditary sovereigns. On the demise of Hasen V., in 1319, without male issue, his grandson in the female line, Magnus Smek, united in his person the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway. Magnus was succeeded in the kingdom of Norway by his son Hagen VI., husband of the celebrated Margaret, and at his decease, in 1380, Norway was united to Denmark by their son Olof V., who dying, without issue, Margaret herself was raised to the throne by the unanimous voice of the nation. On her death it descended with Denmark and Sweden to her nephew Eric. Sweden was afterwards separated from Denmark by the valour and address of Gustavus Vasa. By the treaty of Kiel, in January, 1814, Norway was ceded by the king of Denmark to Sweden; but the people, not approving of the cession, had recourse to arms, in order to resist the entrance of the Swedish troops into their country; and the diet elected Prince Christian, the king of Denmark's son, who was then governor, to the throne. However, on the conclusion of the war with France, the allied powers, who had previously promised this country to Sweden, if she would take an active part in the coalition against the French empire, now did all in their power to enforce the cession. For this purpose a considerable body of their troops was marched into the Danish territories on the continent, to watch that power, and all the ports of Norway were blockaded by the Swedish and English fleets by sea, while the Swedish army, under the crown prince, entered Norway by land. Amidst such united efforts, it was not to be expected that the brave Norwegians could hold out long. After the capture of Frederickstadt, and the passage of the Glommen by the Swedes, Prince Christian proposed to resign his crown into the hands of the Diet: and on the 20th of October, 1814, that assembly came to the resolution that Norway should be governed by the king of Sweden, but as an integral state, preserving its constitution and laws, to which Sweden assented. Christiania is the capital.

Norwich, a city and county of England, the capital of Norfolk, and a bishop's see. It was formerly surrounded by a strong wall, of which some ruins still remain. Many of the streets are still narrow and ill-disposed, though during the last 10 years considerable improvements have been effected. Besides the cathedral, which is one of the most spacious and elegant in the kingdom, here are 39 parish churches, two churches for the Flemings, a number of dissenting meeting-houses, and two Roman Catholic chapels. On a hill, commanding an extensive view of the city, is the castle, an ancient and stately edifice. Near this city, on Mousehold Heath, are the ruins of the castle of Kett, the tanner, by whose rebellion, in the reign of Edward VI., the city was reduced to a ruinous state. Norwich has extensive manufactures of crapes, bombazines, and stuffs of various kinds, and a considerable trade. It is seated on the river Yare, 22 m. W. of Yarmouth and 110 N. E. of London. Long. 1. 20. E., lat. 52. 40. N.

Pop. 5,169, this township comprises 3 villages, the largest of which is Chelsea Landing. Here are large manufactures of cotton, flannel, carpeting, paper, iron, linseed oil, &c. Here is an ancient aboriginal cemetery called the Burying Ground of the Uncas. Also a p.t. Chenango Co. N. Y. Pop. 3,374, and a township of Franklin Co. Ohio, on the Scioto, 8 m. above Columbus.

Nossen, a town of Saxony, on the Muldau, 18 m. W. of Dresden.

Noteburg, a town of Russia, in the government of Petersburg, seated on an island in the lake Ladoga, at the place where the Neva issues. It has a good citadel, and was capital of Ingria, before Petersburg was built. It is 25 m. E. of Petersburg. Long. 31. 9. E., lat. 59. 58. N.

Noto, a town of Sicily, capital of Val di Noto. It was ruined by an earthquake in 1693, and near it another town was built called Noto Nuovo. It is 22 m. S. W. of Syracuse. Long. 15. 19. E., lat. 36. 50. N.

Nottingham, a borough and the capital of Nottinghamshire, Eng. It is situate on the side and summit of a rock, into which are cut some small habitations, and numerous vaults or cellars. To the W. of the town, on a rocky eminence, is the castle, a magnificent modern structure, belonging to the duke of Newcastle, built on the site of an ancient fortress, celebrated in English history. It is a handsome town, distinguished by its spacious market-place, and noted for its excellent ale. It is one of the principal seats of the silk and cotton stocking manufacture; the lace manufacture is also very extensive. At this town Charles I. set up his standard, at the commencement of the civil war which terminated in his destruction. Nottingham is seated on a river, which communicates with the Trent, 1 m. to the S. It is 16 m. E. of Derby and 124 N. by W. of London. Long. 1. 9. W., lat. 52. 58. N.

Nottoaway, a river of Virginia flowing into the Meherrin.

Nottinghamshire, a county of England, 48 m. long and 25 broad; bounded N. by Yorkshire. It enjoys such a temperature of soil and climate as to render it one of the most fertile and healthful counties in England. Almost the whole of the middle and western parts of the county were formerly occupied by the extensive forest of Sherwood, the only royal forest N. of the Trent; but the greater part is now enclosed and covered with thriving towns, cheerful villages, and extensive parks. The chief products of this county are coal, of which there is great plenty, gypsum, lead, grain of all sorts, cattle, malt, hops, wool, liquorice, and woad. The manufactures chiefly consist of hosiery, bobbin-net and net-lace, glass, and earthenware.

Nottoaway, a county of the E. District of Virginia. Pop. 10,141.

Nova Scotia, a British province of N. America, which formerly, till 1784, included the province of New Brunswick. It is bounded on the S. and S. E. by the Atlantic, E. by the gut of Canso, N.

by Northumberland Strait, and N. W. by New Brunswick and the bay of Fundy. Its length is 235 m. from Cape Sable on the S. W. to Cape Canso on the N. E. Its extreme breadth is 88 m. but the mean of the peninsular part is not more than 45. It has several lakes and a vast number of small rivers. It is a peninsula, lying S. E. of New Brunswick, and joined to it by a narrow isthmus, at the N. E. extremity of the bay of Fundy. The French settled here before they made any establishment in Canada, and called it Acadia. The first grant of lands was made to Sir William Alexander, by James I. of England, from whom it received the name of Nova Scotia. Since its first settlement it has more than once changed rulers and proprietors, nor was it confirmed to England till the peace of Utrecht in 1713. The inhabitants consists of English, Scotch, Irish, and a few Germans: recent accounts state them at 150,000, and they are rapidly increasing in number and prosperity. The soil is in many parts thin and sterile, but there are some tracts not inferior to the best lands in New England. Halifax is the capital.

Nova Zembla, an island in the Arctic Ocean, separated from the continent of Russia by the strait of Waigatz. It is 540 m. in length and from 100 to 240 in breadth. This country was discovered by the English in 1553, and it has since been visited by ships attempting to discover a N. E. passage. In 1695, a Dutch vessel being cast away on the coast, the crew were obliged to winter here, and with great difficulty preserved their lives. The country is extremely desolate, producing no trees, nor any vegetables but moss and some few arctic plants. It is inhabited by wild beasts, particularly white bears, white foxes, elks, reindeer, and rabbits. The hunters from Archangel now generally winter here, and return home in summer with their cargoes of skins and furs. Long. 52. to 78. E., lat. 70. to 78. N.

Novalle, a town of Austrian Italy, in the Trevisano, 10 m. S. W. of Treviso.

Novara, a town of Italy, capital of a province of its name in the Sardinian Milanese. It contains 17 churches, besides the cathedral, and is seated on an eminence, 25 m. W. by S. of Milan.

Novellara, a town of Italy, in the Modenese, with a castle, 17 m. E. by N. of Parma and 18 m. N. N. W. of Modena.

Novi, a town of the Sardinian states, in the territory of Genoa, with a strong castle on a mountain. It is the principal deposit for goods coming from the Levant, which pass into Austrian Italy, and thence into the S. of Germany. Near this place, in 1799, the Austrians and Russians defeated the French, who lost their general (Joubert), and nearly 10,000 men. 25 m. N. by W. of Genoa.

Novi, a fortified town of Croatia, taken by the Austrians in 1789. It is seated on the right bank of the Unna, 52 m. S. E. of Carlstadt. Long. 16. 53. E., lat. 45. 8. N.

Novi Bazar, a town of Servia, seated near the Oresco, 72 m. W. of Nissa and 95 S. of Belgrade. Long. 21. 1. E., lat. 43. 35. N.

Novigrad, a town of Hungary, capital of a county of the same, with a castle; seated on a mountain, near the Danube, 25 m. N. of Euda.

Novigrad, a town of Austrian Dalmatia, with a castle, seated on a lake of the same name, near the gulf of Venice, 17 m. E. of Nona and 25 N. W. of Zaro.

Novogorod, a city of Russia, capital of a govern ment of the same name, and formerly called Great Novgorod, to distinguish it from other towns of the same appellation. It was for a long time governed by its own dukes, and was in fact a republic, under the jurisdiction of a nominal sovereign. It was the great mart of trade between Russia and the Hanseatic cities, and made the most rapid advances in opulence and population. Its power was so great, and its situation so impregnable, as to give rise to a proverb: 'Who can resist the gods and Great Novgorod?' But in the 15th century this independent republic was obliged to submit to Ivan Basilowitz I., grand duke of Russia. It continued, nevertheless, the largest and most commercial city in Russia, and contained at least 400,000 inhabitants. It was first desolated by the cruelties of Ivan Basilowitz II.; but its splendor was not totally eclipsed until Peter the Great built Petersburg, to which he transferred all the commerce of the Baltic that had before centered here. It now contains scarcely 8,000 souls; and a vast number of churches and convents stand as melancholy monuments of its former magnificence. The town stretches on both sides of the Volkoff, a river of considerable depth and rapidity, which separates it into two divisions, namely the trading part and the quarter of St. Sophia: in the latter are the ruins of the cathedral, in which several princes of the ducal family of Russia are interred. Novgorod is situate near the N. end of the lake Ilmen, 120 m. S. S. E. of Petersburg. Long. 31. 45. E., lat. 58. 25. N.

Novogorod, Niznei, a city of Russia, capital of a government of the same name, and an archbishop's see. It has a castle, surrounded by stone walls, also two cathedrals, 28 parish churches, and five convents. The trade is considerable, and the shops richly furnished with all kinds of foreign and home goods. It is seated at the conflux of the Ooca with the Volga, 250 m. E. by N. of Moscow.

Novogorod, Severskoi, a town of Russia, government of Czernigov, seated on the Desna, 88 m. E. N. E. of Czernigov.

Novogrodek, a town of Russian Lithuania, government of Grodno, seated on a hill in a vast plain, 80 m. S. by E. of Wilna. Long. 26. 8. E., lat. 53. 25. N.

Novomirgorod, a town of Russia, in the government of Catharineslaf, 160 m. N. N. W. of Cherson. Long. 31. 44. E., lat. 48. 40. N.

Nowra, a town of Austrian Poland, near which are mines of gold and silver. 30 m. S. of Cracow.

Noya, a town of Spain, in Galicia. The chief trade is in ship-building. It stands at the mouth of the Tambre, 15 m. W. of Compostella.

Noyers, a town of France, department of Yonne, with a castle; seated on the Serin, 19 m. E. S. E. of Auxerre.

Noyon, a town of the department of Oise, the birth-place of the celebrated Calvin. It is an episcopal see, and is seated near the Oise, 25 m. N. W. of Soissons and 70 N. by E. of Paris.

Nozonton, a village in Newcastle Co. Del. 22 m. S. W. Wilmington.

Nozeroy, a town in the department of Jura, with a castle on a mountain, 20 m. S. E. of Salins.

Nubia, a country of Africa, bounded on the N. by Egypt, E. by the Red Sea, S. by Abyssinia and Harfoo, and W. by Bornou. It is about 600 m. in length and 450 in breadth. The Nile runs through it, on the banks of which it is fruitful, but in other places barren, sandy, and destitute of water. The inhabitants make their bread and drink of a small round seed called doca, or seff, which is a kind of millet. Their houses have mud walls, are very low, and covered with reeds. The dress of the better sort is a vest without sleeves, and they have no coverings for their heads, legs, or feet. The common people wrap a piece of linen cloth about them, and the children go quite naked. They are described as a stupid and debauched people, but profess to be Mahometans. The productions of the country are gold, elephants' teeth, civit, and sandal wood; and a great many slaves are sent into Egypt.

Nuez, a town of Spain, in the province of Leon, on the borders of Portugal, 15 m. E. of Braganza and 48 W. of Zamora.

Nuitz, a town of France, department of Cote d'Or, famous for its excellent wines. It is seated at the foot of a mountain, 15 m. S. S. W. of Dijon.

Nun, or Vled de Nun, an extensive country of Africa, of which the emperor of Morocco arrogates to himself the sovereignty, but his real authority is extremely feeble. It is inhabited by different tribes of Arabs, whose camps are scattered over such interior parts of the country as are capable of cultivation.

Nun, a river of Africa running into the Bight of Benin, now ascertained to be one of the mouths of the great river Quorra or Niger. See Niger.

Nunda, p. t. Alleghany Co. N. Y. 256 m. W. Albany. Pop. 1,291.

Nundyroog, a town and fortress of Hindoostan, in Mysore. It is built on the summit of a mountain, 1,700 feet in height, the greater part inaccessible; but was besieged and taken by the English, under lord Cornwallis, in 1792. It is 70 m. N. of Seringapatam.

Nuneaton, a town in Warwickshire, Eng. with manufactures of woolen cloth and ribands. It was formerly noted for its nunnery, and is seated on the river Anker, 9 m. N. by E. of Coventry and 98 N. W. of London.

Nunjinagodu, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a ruinous fort, and a large square temple. It is situate in the fork formed by the junction of Kaundini with the Kapini, 12 m. S. by E. of Mysore.

Nuany, a village in Somersetshire, Eng. 3 m. S. W. of Frome. Here are the ruins of a strong castle, the shell of which still remains nearly perfect. It was burnt by the parliament forces in 1645.

Nuremberg, a town of Bavaria, in the circle of Rezat. It is surrounded by an old wall and ditch, more than 3 m. in circumference, formerly flanked with 365 towers; and through the middle of the town flows the river Pegnitz, over which are six stone bridges and several of wood. The inhabitants are very industrious, and their maps and prints, as well as their musical and mathematical instruments are in high esteem; nor are they less curious in clock-work, and in the several manufactures of iron, steel, ivory, wood, and alabaster. The toys commonly known in England by the name of Dutch toys are also made here. Among the public institutions are a famous academy for painting, an anatomical theatre, and a public library. The ancient castle or palace is still standing at the extremity of the city, and the arsenal is one of the best in Germany. The houses are built of freestone, and are four or five stories high. Nu renberg was given to Bavaria by the treaty of Tilsit in 1807. It is 95 m. N. by W. of Munich and 250 W. N. W. of Vienna. Long. 11. 4. E., lat.

49. 27. N.

Murtingen, a town of Wurtemberg with an hospital, founded in 1481, said to be the richest foundation in the kingdom. It is situate on the Neck-ar, 14 m. S. E. of Stuttgart.

Musserpour, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name, in the province of Sind-dy. It is situate on the Sinde, 58 m. N. E. of Tatta. Long. 69. 10. E., lat. 25. 28. N.

Nyborg, a sea-port of Denmark, on the E. coast of the isle of Funen. The remains of the old palace, in which Christian II. was born, now serve for a magazine and arsenal. It is seated on a bay of the Great Belt, 10 m. E. of Odensee. Long.
10. 40. E., lat. 55. 30. N.

Nyköping, a town of Denmark, in N. Jutland, with a good harbour, on the gulf of Lymford. It stands on the E. side of the island of Mors, which is formed by branches of the gulf, 40 m. W. by
S. of Alburg. Long. 8. 36. E., lat. 56. 52. N.

Nyköping, a sea-port of Denmark, capital of the isle of Falster, with a royal palace, and one of the best endowed hospitals in the kingdom. It stands on a narrow channel, opposite the island of Laland, 60 m. S. S. W. of Copenhagen. Long.
11. 58. E., lat. 54. 50. N.

Nyköping, a government of Sweden, comprehending the W. part of Sudermania.

Nyköping, a neat town of Sweden, capital of Sudermania, with a harbour, and the remains of a strong castle. It is the most ancient town in the kingdom, and was formerly the residence of the kings of Sudermania. It is seated on a river of the same name, near the Baltic, 70 m. S. W. of Stockholm. Long. 17. 27. E., lat. 58. 35. N.

Nyland, a province of European Russia, in Finland, lying on the gulf of Finland, to the W. of Carelia. It is 120 m. long and from 30 to 60 broad; and is a fertile pleasant country, being better peopled and cultivated than the neighbouring provinces. The inhabitants (about 115,000) carry on some trade in corn, cattle, planks, linen, and dried fish.

Nyslot, a town of Russia, in the government of Wiburg, on the lake Saima. The castle, which stands on a rock in a river, near the town, is strongly fortified by nature and art. It was taken by the Russians in 1714, restored to the Swedes at the peace of Nystadt, but finally given up to the Russians by the treaty of Abo in 1743. 50
m. N. W. of Wiburg.

Nyslot, a town of Russia, in the government of Livonia, with a castle; 20 m. S. by W. of Narva.

Nystadt, a town of Russia, in Finland, with a commodious harbour, and a considerable trade in all kinds of wooden vessels. In 1721 a peace was concluded here between Russia and Sweden. It is seated on a bay of the gulf of Bothnia, 38 m.
N. W. of Abo. Long. 21. 31. E., lat. 61. 10. N.

Nysted, a town of Denmark, on the S. E. coast of the isle of Laland. It carries on a considerable trade with the provinces of Germany, and is 22 m. E. S. E. of Naxkow.

Oceanica, a name introduced by Malte Brun, to designate a fifth grand division of the globe, comprising the islands of the Indian Seas and the Pacific Ocean, with the continent of New Holland, and all the Antarctic regions. The limits and general character of this division of the earth are described by this celebrated geographer in the following words.

The Chinese Sea separates Asia from the great ocean, as the Mediterranean separates Africa from Europe. To the west we continue the boundary line through the strait of Malacca, and then turning round the north point of Sumatra, we proceed to the point where the 92d meridian east from London crosses the equator. Through the whole southern hemisphere, that meridian will form a convenient division between the seas of New Holland and those of Madagascar and Africa. The islands of Amsterdam and St. Paul will, on this principle, remain connected with the Archipelago of the Indian Ocean. When we leave the Chinese Sea to the north, the channel between Formosa and the Philippines being the broadest, marks the natural boundary. From this we draw a line which, following that part of the waters which in most of islands, separates the Japanese seas to a distance of 300 or 450 m., and reaches the point of intersection of the 40th parallel of north latitude with the 152d meridian. The 40th parallel will continue to bound the new division of the world, till we come to the point where it is crossed by the 158th western meridian from London. Taking our departure from this point, we separate the North American seas from those of the Oceanic Archipelago by the shortest line that can be drawn from this to the point of intersection of the 106th western meridian and the equator. This meridian will be our boundary through the southern hemisphere.

The fifth part of the world thus determined is found to be situated in the Great Ocean, that which, of all others, is THE OCEAN, by way of eminence. This essential character is not common to it with any other division of the globe: it is a character which impresses a special physiognomy on its geography, as well as on its natural and its civil history. It is therefore worthy of being made the foundation of its name. It will be called OCEANICA, and its inhabitants Oceanians; names which will supersede the unmeaning or inaccurate designations of Australasia, Notasia, Austral India, and Australia. New Holland has not one Asiatic feature. Extending the principle of the nomenclature which is in present use, we ought to call Africa "Occidental Asia." This designation would be equally correct with those others. There is no occasion for perpetuating the memory of the pretended Terra Australis, in the name of a part of the world which is not exclusively situated on the Austral (or southern) hemisphere. The happier term of Polynesia will be preserved for that subdivision of Oceanica to which it has been specially applied.

The great countries of Oceanica are exposed to the influence of a vertical sun. It is probable that New Holland, unless it contains inland seas, has a climate as hot and arid as Africa. The marshy shores of some islands in the north-west of Oceanica, exposed to an intense heat, generate a pestiferous air, which may be corrected by human cultivation. Notwithstanding these local inconveniences, Oceanica presents to the industrious, the healthy, and the temperate, a greater diversity of delightful climates than any other part of the world. Such islands as are small and elevated resemble so many paradises. By selecting localities with the proper elevations, the Englishman may find his fresh lawns and his moss-covered trees, the Italian his orange-groves, and the West Indian planter his fields of sugar cane. The small extent of these islands procures for them the temperature of the ocean. The heat never becomes insupportable, even for northern Europeans. The air is continually renewed by the light sea and land breezes, dividing the empire of day and night. Their perpetual spring is rarely disturbed by hurricanes or earthquakes. None of the great races of quadrupeds, either of Asia or New Holland, has extended to the small islands of Polynesia. The pig is the only one found everywhere domesticated, and is the same species as in India and China. Dogs, cats, and rats, formed the whole quadruped class in these islands before Captain Cook supplied them with goats and cattle. Ornithology offers, through the whole of Oceanica, a little more variety, along with many features of mutual resemblance.

The vegetable kingdom of Oceanica presents to us all the riches of India in new splendour, and accompanied by new pleasures unknown to Asia. In the Sunda islands, the Philippines, and the Moluccas, rice occupies the place of wheat; and the culture of it is probably extended over New Guinea. Further to the east, in the islands of Polynesia, there are four exceedingly useful esculent plants, which grow either spontaneously, or under the influence of culture; the potato, the yam, and two species of arum, from which, by culture and boiling, a sweet farinaceous substance is obtained.

Two orders of trees are spread over all the midling and small islands of Oceanica, which delight both the eye and the taste. The numerous family of the palms is extended over the most remote and smallest islands. Between the tropics there is scarcely a rock or a sand-bank on which these trees do not display their astonishing vegetation. The palms have, in the interior structure of their trunks, no analogy with other trees. In habit and in structure they resemble the ferns, in their blossom the grasses, and the asparagus in their mode of fructification. But no trees are so portly and magnificent as the palms. They present a straight column, perfectly cylindrical, crowned at the summit with a vast load of sprightly leaves, arranged in circles over one another, and put forth from their common receptacle large panicles, partially inclosed in ample sheaths, and loaded with flowers and with fruit. But their majestic appearance is their least merit. Their beauty is surpassed, by their usefulness. The external layers of the trunk furnish a hard and heavy wood, which may be formed into planks and stakes. The sheaths which contain the clusters of fruit acquire such thickness and consistence that they are often used as vessels. The large leaves are employed for roofing wigwams and cottages. Materials for wadding, flock, and cordage, are furnished by the fibrous pericarp of the cocoa-tree, by the leaf stalks of several other species, and by the filamentous tissue which, in all of them, covers the trunk. Of these are made ropes, cables, and even sail-cloth, and they are used as oakum in caulking vessels. The leaves of the Macaw tree (latinier) serve for fans to the Indian fair ones; those of the Borassus flabelliformis furnish parasols which can cover ten people at a time. The leaves of some palms are used for writing on: the shell of the cocoa-nut supplies us with a natural cup. This order of trees furnishes a number of excellent dishes. The sweet and pulpy substance surrounding the shells of some is eaten and pressed in a variety of forms: such are the Areca catechu and the Phoenix dactylifera. In some, as the cocoa-nut, the perisperm or cotyledonous matter, while in others, as the cabbage palm, or Areca oleracea, the terminal leaf-bud is used as a pot-herb. The milky liquid contained in the large cavity of the cocoa-nut is capable of being converted into wine, vinegar, and alcohol. From the same fruit a good oil is procured.

Another family of nutritious trees enjoyed by the Oceanian nations is that of the Artocarpi or bread-fruit trees. This valuable genus rises to a height of forty feet. Its trunk acquires the thickness of the human body. The fruit is as large as a child's head. Gathered before it is fully ripe, and baked among ashes, it becomes a wholesome bread, resembling fresh wheaten bread in taste. For a period of eight months, this tree yields its fruit in such profusion, that three of them will support a man for a year. The inner bark of the same tree is manufactured into a kind of cloth. Its wood is well adapted for building cottages and canoes. Its leaves are used as napkins; its glutinous and milky juice furnishes good cement and glue.

The inhabitants of Oceania seem to be refractory to two stocks, totally distinct both in physiognomy and in language; the Malays, or Yelw Oceanians, and the Oceanian Negroes.

The Malays are no longer considered by the learned as having originally come from the peninsula of Malacca: it is now understood that it was not till a comparatively recent period that they became inhabitants of that country. Their national historians trace their origin to the island of Sumatra; they also describe them as connected with the Javanese; but we find them at present extending over numerous countries. Not only are all the inhabitants of the maritime parts of Borneo, Celebes, Luzon, and the Moluccas, of the Malay race; but the innumerable tribes of Polynesia, or eastern Oceanica, seem to have the same origin. Although the Marians are 5,500 m. from Easter Island, and though Owyhee is at nearly an equal distance from New Zealand, we have a collection of facts, authenticated by the concurring testimony of numerous observers, which force us to regard the families disseminated over this wide region as having a common origin.

The islanders have tawny complexions, varying a little in the different tribes, independently of any ascertainable circumstances in their habits of life or their climate. The fairest are generally in the most westerly regions; some of them, as the Battas of Sumatra, are directly under the equator. The hair of the head is long, lank, rough, and always black. The hair of the beard, and in general of every part except the head, is scanty. They are in the practice of plucking out that of the beard in their youth. The Mahometan priests, affecting to wear long beards, cultivate them to the best of their power, but not with so much success as to escape ridicule. Their persons are short, squat, and robust; their lower limbs somewhat large, but not ill-formed. The busts of the females are much inferior in symmetry to those of the women of Indostan. The face is round, the mouth wide, the teeth remarkably good, the chin square, the cheek bones high, the cheeks rather hollow. The nose is short and small, never prominent, but never flat; the eyes are small, and like those of other Orientals, always black. They are an ill-looking people compared to the Arabs, Birmans, and Siamese. They are less handsomely formed than the Chinese, but have much better features.

Differences in colour and in the appearance of the hair have been observed between the great and the common people in Otaheite, which led Forster to believe that a Malay colony had subdued in these islands some prior negro tribes, of the race which inhabits New Guinea and New Holland. But others may, with some probability, ascribe this difference to habit and diet, as the great live on the flesh of quadrupeds, and the common people chiefly on fish.

The similarity of the languages, as exhibited in the very imperfect vocabularies given by Forster, Father Gobien, Marsden, and others, is strongly marked. The inhabitants of eastern Oceanica speak the same language in different dialects, and this presents a singular analogy to that of the Malays, particularly that spoken in Sumatra.

Ochsenfurt, a town of Bavarian Franconia, seated on the Maine, 10 m. S. E. of Wurzburg.

Ochsenhausen, a town of Wurtemberg, capital of a petty principality (formerly the territory of a rich abbey), which was given to prince Metternich in 1803. 14 m. S. of Ulm.

Ocrida. See Lochrida.

Oczakow, or Otchahof, a decayed sea-port and fortress of Russia, in the government of Catharienslaf. It has been frequently an object of contest between the Turks and Russians, many thousands of whom, on both sides, have fallen in its different sieges. The Russians took it by storm in 1788, and it was confirmed to them by the subsequent peace. This important place is the key to both the Bog and the Dnieper, rivers of great consequence to this part of the empire. It is seated near the Black Sea, on the N. side of the estuary of the Dnieper, opposite Kinburn, 50 m. W. of Cherson and 190 N. E. of Constantinople. Long. 30. 30. E., lat. 46. 35. N.

Odenbach, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Deux Ponts; seated on the Glan, 34 m. W. of Mentz.

Odensee, a town of Denmark, capital of the isle of Funen, and a bishop's see. It supplies the greatest part of the army with all their leather accoutrements, and is particularly famous for gloves. Here are also manufactures of cloth, sugar, and soap; it is situate on a river, 6 m. from the bay of Stegestrand and 90 W. by S. of Copenhagen. Long. 10. 25. E., lat. 55. 30. N.

Oder, a river of the Austrian empire, which rises in the mountains of Moravia, and flows through Brandenburg and Pomerania. Below Stettin it forms a large lake or bay, called Gross Haff, and then enters the Baltic Sea by three channels, called Peene, Swin, and Diwenow; between which lie the islands of Usedom and Wollin.

Oderberg, a town of Moravia, on the confines of Silesia, with a castle, seated on the Oder, at the influx of the Elsa, 18 m. N. N. W. of Teschen.

Oderberg, a town of the Prussian province of Brandenburg, situate on the Oder, 25 m. N. W. of Custrin.

Odernheim, a town of Germany, in Hesse Darmstadt, on the Seltz, 14 m. S. of Mentz.

Odessa, a fortified sea-port of Russia, in the government of Catharienslaf. The town is well built, and is rapidly increasing in size and importance. The population is estimated at nearly 40,000 who carry on a good trade and have manufactures of woollens, silks, gunpowder, soap, &c. It is seated on a gulf of the Black Sea, 44 m. W. by S. of Oczakow and 99 E. of Cherson.

Odeypore. See Oudipore.

Odeypore, a town of Hindoostan, capital of Jushpour, in the province of Orissa. It is 60 m. N. E. of Rutenpour and 220 N. W. of Cuttack. Long. 83. 22. E., lat. 22. 37. N.

Odiham, a town in Hampshire, Eng. Here are the remains of an ancient castle, and of a royal palace, barns, &c. It is seated on the Basingstoke Canal, 24 m. N. E. of Winchester and 42 W. by S. of London.

Ochsfeld, a town of Prussian Saxony, seated on the Aller, 23 m. N. E. of Brunswick.

Ockrossen, a town of Saxony, in Meissen, situate near the Flohe, 9 m. N. E. of Chemnitz.

Oelan, an island of Sweden, in the Baltic, separated from the coast of Gothland by a strait 12 m. broad in the narrowest part. It is 80 m. long, but not more than 9 broad. The N. part has fine forests, and quarries of excellent freestone the S. is more level, and very fertile. Both parts abound in alum mines. Bornholm, the chief town, is seated on the strait, 23 m. E. N. E. of Calmar. Long. 16. 50. E., lat. 56. 48. N.

Oels, a town of Prussian Silesia, capital of a principality of the same name, which now forms part of the government of Breslau, belonging to the duke of Brunswick. The town stands on a river of the same name, is surrounded with walls, and has a palace, formerly occupied by the prince. 17 m. E. N. E. of Breslau. Long. 17. 31. E., lat. 51. 12. N.

circuit. It has no harbour, and is neither so populous nor fertile as the islands to the N. of it; but its manufactures are of a superior kind, the cloth is of a better dye, and the spears and clubs are better carved and polished. The people are lusty and well made, and rather browner than those of Tahiti. Long. 150. 47. W., lat. 22. 27. S.

Ohio, a river of the United States flowing into the Mississippi, from the N. E. It is formed by the junction of the Allegany and Monongahela which rise in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and unite at Pittsburg in the former state. Its general course to the Mississippi is S. W. but it has innumerable sinuosities; its length in a straight line from Pittsburg to the Mississippi is 614 m. and by its windings 908. In the lower part of its course its width is about a mile. There is no obstruction to the navigation except the falls at Louisville, which are avoided by a canal. See Louisville. In winter and spring it is 50 feet deeper than at the end of summer, when it may be forded at the falls. The rains at the end of the year raise the water sometimes 12 feet in a day. Their highest elevation is in March. For half its length in the upper part, it is frozen in the winter, and the breaking up of the ice in March often occasions immense damage. In the spring of 1839 an uncommon flood of the river inundated a great part of Cincinnati, overflowed many other towns upon the banks, and destroyed a vast amount of property.

The Ohio is a very beautiful river, and the interval lands upon its borders are highly fertile. It embosoms more than 100 islands, and the scenery along its course is diversified with abrupt eminences, and extensive alluvial tracts covered with thick forests of sycamore, dogwood, and other beautiful trees. It is of great importance in the navigation of the western states and is connected with Lake Erie by a canal. See the following article.

Ohio Canal, unites the Ohio with Lake Erie. Beginning at Cleveland, on the lake, it proceeds southerly along the Cuyahoga, to the portage between this stream and the Tuscarawas; here it strikes the latter stream, and passes along its valley southwesterly. It then passes off to the Scioto and descends the valley of that river to the Ohio at Portsmouth. It is 306 m. in length, besides a lateral cut to Columbus of 11 m., and the Dresden-cut with slack water navigation of 17 m. It has 11,185 ft. of lockage. This canal was projected by the state of Ohio. It was begun in 1825, and is now nearly finished. It has cost less than 10,000 dollars a mile. Another canal joins the Ohio with the Miami. It leaves the Ohio at Cincinnati and extends northerly to Dayton on the Miami. It is 70 m. in length. A further communication is projected from this point to Lake Erie and the Ohio canal by rail-roads.

Ohio, one of the United States; bounded N. by Michigan Territory and Lake Erie, E. by Pennsylvania and Virginia, S. by Virginia and Kentucky and W. by Indiana. It extends from 38. 30. to 42. N. lat., and from 80. 35. to 84. 47. W. long. 220 m. in length and breadth, and containing 40,000 sq. m. It is washed on the whole southern limit by the Ohio, and is intersected by its tributaries the Muskingum, Scioto and Great and Little Miami. The Maumee, Sandusky and Cuyahoga flow into Lake Erie. In this part, the state has 150 m. of coast, containing several harbours, the chief of which are those of Sandusky, Cleveland and Ashtabula. There are no mountains in the state, and hardly any hills. Most of the soil is susceptible of cultivation. In the north it is somewhat marshy; the banks of the rivers are highly fertile: in the interior are extensive plains of excellent soil, and the state altogether may be pronounced equal in fertility to almost any region of the earth. The forests consist of walnut, various species of oaks, hickory, sugar maple, and other sorts; beech, birch, poplar, ash, sycamore, paw-paw, buckeye, cherry, dogwood, elm, hornbeam, &c. With the exception of a few cypress trees, this state produces hardly any evergreens. Many sorts of medicinal roots are found here, as ginseng, valerian, columbo, snakeroot, and bloodroot. Coal is abundant in the eastern parts, as also iron, but there are few mines. Marble is plentiful, and salt springs furnish water nearly as strong as that of the sea. Near the falls of the Little Miami, are the Yellow Springs, the waters of which are a strong chalybeate, and in considerable esteem for their medicinal qualities.

The agricultural products are maize, wheat, rye, barley, oats, spelt and buckwheat. Fruits are abundant, and the soil is thought to be the best for garden vegetables of any in the western country. Tobacco has been lately introduced. Hemp is cultivated in some parts.

Ohio enjoys the most active commerce of all the western states. The northern and eastern counties export to Montreal and New York by the lake, great quantities of agricultural produce. But the chief of the exports are to New Orleans. The articles are flour, grain, pork, bacon, lard, whiskey, horses, and cattle.

The domestic manufactures are considerable, and there are some large manufactories of woolen, cotton, and paper, at Cincinnati, Zanesville, Steubenville, Dayton, and other places. The manufacture of steam machinery, and other articles from iron, is considerable. To these may be added linseed and castor oil, whiskey, cabinet furniture and salt.

The number of counties in Ohio is 73. The Pop. 937,637. Slavery is prohibited. The legislature is called the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The senators are chosen for two years and the representatives for one. The Governor is chosen for two years. Suffrage is universal and elections are popular. Columbus is the seat of government and Cincinnati the largest city. The other towns of importance are Zanesville, Steubenville, Chillicothe, Dayton, Marietta and Circleville. There are 4 tribes of Indians in the state; the Wyandots, Shawnees, Delawares, and Ottawas. The Senecas have recently removed west of the Mississippi. The four tribes number about 1,500 souls, and own 336,341 acres of land, which is secured to them by treaty. Considerable annuities are paid them by the United States government.

The most numerous religious sect are the Presbyterians; they have 203 ministers; the Baptists 140; the Methodists 91; the Lutherans 37; the Associate Presbyterians 20; the German Reformed 82; the Episcopalians 16; the Swedenborgians 4; there are also some Catholics, Unitarians, Universalists, Quakers and Shakers. Two universities enjoy endowments from the state; they are established at Athens and Oxford. There are also colleges at New Athens, Hudson and Gambier, and about 20 incorporated academies in different places.

The first settlement in Ohio was made at Marietta in 1783. A territorial government was established the next year. In 1802 it was admitted as a state into the Union. The fertility of the soil, and happy local position of the state for trade, have made it one of the most desirable regions of the western country for emigrants, and its increase in population and wealth has been almost unparalleled.

Ohlau, a town of Prussian Silesia, with a fine castle. Great quantities of tobacco are produced in the neighbourhood. It is situated on the Ohla, 16 m. S. E. of Breslau.

Örebro, a government of Sweden, comprising the old province of Nericia, part of Westmannland, and a small part of Wärmeland. It contains 1,780 square miles, with 100,000 inhabitants.

Örebro, the capital of the above mentioned government has a considerable trade with Stockholm, across the lakes Hielmar and Maeler, by means of the river and canal of Arboga; sending iron, vitrol, and red paint, in particular, to that capital. In the middle of the town, on a small island formed by the Swart, stands the castle, formerly a royal residence. It is seated near the W. extremity of the lake Hielmar, 100 m. W. by S. of Stockholm. Long. 15. 12. E., lat. 59. 30. N.

Oregon, or Columbia, a river of the United States flowing into the Pacific Ocean. It rises in the Rocky Mountains about lat. 55. N. and flows S. W. to the Sea in lat. 46. 15. N. Its length is 1,500 m., and it has several large tributaries as Clark's River, Lewis's River, and the Multnomah. Its head streams are near those of the Missouri, and its course is considerably obstructed by falls, but it admits a navigation 180 m. from its mouth. All its waters abound in fine salmon, and towards the sea, they contain great numbers of seals.

Oregon Territory, the popular name of all that part of the United States territory west of the Rocky Mountains, watered by the abovementioned river. It extends from 42. to 51. N. lat. along the coast of the Pacific Ocean. It is bounded N. by the Russian and British American possessions, E. by the Rocky Mountains, S. by the Mexican territories, and W. by the Pacific. Between the Rocky Mountains and the sea is another chain through which the Oregon river passes at the great falls, and still farther west another ridge runs parallel with the coast at about 150 m. distance. These ridges are lofty, and their peaks are covered with perpetual snow. Among these mountains, there are sheltered and fertile valleys. The timber in the mountains is pine, spruce, fir, &c. The plains generally have a fine soil; but are very deficient in timber. The prairies, like those on the eastern sides of these mountains, are covered with grass, and a profusion of most beautiful flowers. Among the prairie plants are two or three kinds of edible roots, which furnish vegetable food to the savages, as an aid to the great proportion of salmon, which they devour. Wild sage is also an abundant herb. It grows of a height equal to that of small tree; and on these extensive plains is one of the principal articles of fuel. The sea shore, for a considerable distance to the interior, is skirted with deep and thick forests of evergreens, such as pine and hemlock. Sheltered on the north by protecting ridges of mountains, and the breezes from the west being softened by coming over immense extents of sea, the climate is as mild as it is in the country east of these mountains four or five degrees south of that point. When Lewis and Clark left the country in March, and in the latitude of Montreal, the prairies were in blossom, and the forwardness of the season seems to have corresponded with that of North Carolina at the same time. The winters are rainy, and some parts of them severe.

The Spaniards first discovered this country. The river was discovered by Captain Gray, in the ship Columbia of Boston; and it was explored in 1805 by Lewis and Clark. A settlement of fur traders was made at its mouth by the Americans, but it was afterwards abandoned. The Indians in the territory are numbered at 140,000. On the northern part of the coast is Nootka Sound lying between a large island and the continent. The savages which inhabit these parts are better known than any other of the Northwestern tribes.

These savages call themselves Wakash. Their height is above the middle stature, and they are of a muscular frame. Their features are characterized by a prominence of the cheek-bones. Their face is often very much compressed above the cheeks, and appears to sink abruptly between the temples. Their nose, flat at the base, is marked by wide nostrils, and a round point. Their forehead is low, their eyes small and black, and their lips, broad, thick and round. In general, they are entirely destitute of beard, or, at most have only a small thin tuft at the point of their chin. This deficiency, however, is perhaps owing to an artificial cause; for, some of them, and, especially their old men, have bushy beards, and even mustachios. Their eye-brows are scantily supplied with hair, and are always straight; but they have a considerable quantity of very harsh, and very strong hair on their head, which, without a single exception, is black and straight, and floats on their shoulders. A coarse dress of linen, with a covering from the skin of the bear or seaotter, red, black, and white pigments, with which they besmear their body, the whole of their ordinary costume, in short, forms the image of wretchedness and ignorance. Their war-dress is extraordinary. They muffle up their head with pieces of wood, carved into the representation of eagles, wolves, and porpoises' heads. Several families live together in the same hut, the wooden half partitions of which, give it the appearance of a stable. Some of their woolen stuffs, although manufactured without a loom, are very good, and are ornamented with figures of a brilliant colour. They carve clumsy statues of wood.

Their light canoes, which are flat and broad, bound over the waves in the steadiest manner, without the assistance of the outrigger, or balance board, an essential distinction between the canoes of the American tribes, and those of the southern parts of the East Indies, and the islands of Oceania.

Oregrund, a sea-port of Sweden, in Upland, on the gulf of Bothnia, opposite the small island of Ginson. The chief article exported is iron, from the long celebrated mine of Dannemora in its vicinity. It is 70 m. N. of Stockholm. Long. 18. 5. E., lat. 60. 21. N.

Orel, a government of Russia, once a province

Oristagni, a fortified town of Sardinia, and an archbishop's see, with a good harbour. It is seated on the W. coast, on a bay of the same name, 42 m. N. W. of Cagliari. Long. 8. 51. E., lat. 39. 53. N.

Orkened, a town of Sweden, in Schonen, 24 m. N. of Christianstadt.

Orkney Islands, the ancient Orcaades, a cluster of islands to the N. of Scotland, from which they are separated by Pentland Frith. They lie between 57. and 36. and 49. 16. N. lat., and are about 30 in number, but several are small and uninhabited. The largest is sometimes dignified with the appellation of Mainland, but is more frequently called Pomona. Beyond this island, to the N. E., are seen, among others, Rowa, Eglasha, and Westra; Shappinsha and Edda; Stronsa, Sanda, and N. Ronalsha; and to the S. appear Hoy, and S. Ronalsha, with others of inferior note. The currents and tides which flow between these islands are rapid and dangerous, and near the small isle of Swinna are two whirlpools, very dangerous to mariners, especially in calms. The sea coast swarms with seals and otters, and is visited by whales, cod, ling, and haddocks, herrings and other fish; and on the shores are found large oysters, muscles, cockles, &c. The islands are visited by eagles, falcons, wild geese and ducks in great variety, herons, hawks, gulls, &c. Springs of pure water are found in all the mountainous parts, and there are numerous lakes and rivulets abounding in fish. The heath on the mountains shelter grouse, plovers, snipes, &c., but there are no partridges, hares, nor foxes. There are great numbers of small sheep and black cattle, swine, rabbits, and red deer. The products of the valleys and plains are chiefly big and oats. Except juniper, wild myrtle, heath, and a shrub called cyrthordon, there is scarcely a tree or plant to be seen; but this nakedness cannot have been their former state, as many trunks of large oaks are to be found in all the mosses. The climate in summer is moist and cold, but in winter there is very little snow, and that lies only a short time. Preceding the autumnal equinox, dreadful storms of wind rain, and thunder occur. For about three weeks in midsummer these islands enjoy the rays of the sun almost without intermission; but, for the same space in winter, that luminary hardly rises above the horizon, and is commonly obscured by clouds and mists. In this gloomy season the absence of day is supplied partly by moon-light and partly by the radiance of the Aurora Borealis, which here gives a light nearly equal to that of a full moon. The coasts afford numerous bays and harbours for the fisheries. The chief exports are hnen and woolen yarn, stockings, butter, dried fish, herrings, oil, feathers, and skins of various kinds, and kelp. The English language prevails in all these islands, although there are many words in the Norse, or Norwegian, still in use. The inhabitants have the general character of being frugal, sagacious, circumspect and hospitable: but the common people are superstitious. The Orkney and Shetland Isles unite in sending one member to the imperial parliament.

Orleans, a city of France, capital of the department of Loiret, and a bishop's see. It is seated on the Loire, and has a canal thence to the Loing, near Montargis. Under the sons of Clovis, it was the capital of a kingdom. In 1428 it stood a memorable siege against the English, which was raised by the celebrated Joan of Arc, called the Maid of Orleans. It is now considered one of the largest and most pleasant cities in France. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, town house, court of justice, mint, and theatre.

The trade consists in stockings, sheepskins; wine, brandy, corn, grocery, and particularly sugar, which is brought raw from Nantes and Rochelle. The fauxbourg of Paris is of a prodigious length, and that of the Olivet, on the left side of the Loire, has a communication with the city by a bridge of nine arches. Near the city is a forest, containing 94,000 acres, planted with oak and other valuable trees. Orleans is 30 m. N. E. of Blois and 60 S. S. W. of Paris. Long. 1. 54. E., lat. 47. 54. N.

Ormus, a small island in a strait of the same name, at the entrance of the gulf of Persia, 9 m. S. of Gombroon. In 1505 the Portuguese were permitted to form a settlement here, and it was afterwards frequented by a number of rich merchants. In 1623 the Persians, by the assistance of the English, expelled the Portuguese and demolished the buildings. Some time after the Persians rebuilt the fort, and, though they could never bring it to be a place of trade as before, it is still the key of the gulf of Persia, on account of the commodiousness of the harbour. It is almost deserted; for it produces nothing but salt, which sometimes is two inches deep upon the surface of the earth. Long. 56. 25. E., lat. 27. 20. N.

Ornans, a town of France, department of Doubs, seated on the Louvre, 10 m. S. E. of Besançon.

Ostend, a fortified sea-port of the Netherlands, in W. Flanders, seated among a number of canals, and almost surrounded by two of the largest of them, into which ships of great burden may enter with the tide. It is famous for the long siege it sustained from the Spaniards, from July 1601 to September 1604, when it capitulated on honorable terms. On the death of Charles II., of Spain, the French seized Ostend; but in 1706, after the battle of Ramillies, it was retaken by the allies. It was again taken by the French in 1745, but restored in 1748. In the war of 1756 the French garrisoned this town for the empress queen, Maria Theresa. In 1792 it was once more captured by the French; evacuated in 1793; and repossessed in 1794. In 1798 a body of British troops landed here, and destroyed the works of the Bruges Canal; but, the wind shifting before they could re-embark, they were compelled to surrender to the French. 10 m. Otakeite, or Tahiti, an island in the S. Pacific, discovered in 1767 by captain Wallis, who called it George the Third's Island. Captain Cook, who came hither in 1768 to observe the transit of Venus, sailed round the whole island in a boat, and staid three months: it was visited twice afterwards by that celebrated navigator. It consists of two peninsulas, about 30 leagues in circumference. Great part of it is covered with woods, consisting partly of bread-fruit trees, palms, cocoa-nut trees, plantains, bananas, mulberries, sugar-canes, and others peculiar to the climate, particularly a kind of pineapple and the dragon-tree. The birds most common are two sorts of parroquets, one of a beautiful sapphire blue, another of a greenish color, with a few red spots; a king-fisher, of a dark green, with a collar of the same hue round its white throat; a large cuckoo, several sorts of pigeons or doves; and a bluish heron. The only quadrupeds found on the island were hogs, dogs, and rats. The inhabitants have mild features, and a pleasing countenance. They are about the ordinary size of Europeans, of a pale mahogany brown, with fine black hair and eyes. Their provisions are chiefly fish, pork, cocoa-nuts, bread-fruit, and bananas; and they employ sea-water as a sauce both to fish and pork. Nothing can exceed their agility in swimming, diving, and climbing trees; and they are praised for their gentleness, good nature, and hospitality. Previously to the introduction of European habits, the men wore a piece of cloth round their middle, and another wrapped about the head, like a turban; the women had a piece of cloth, with a hole in the middle, through which they passed their heads, so that one part of the garment hung down behind and the other before to the knees, a fine white cloth, like muslin, passing over this in various elegant turns round the body. Tattooing was common among both sexes. Their houses had seldom any walls, but consisted only of a roof, thatched with the long prickly leaves of the palm tree, and supported by a few pillars made of the bread-fruit tree.—The native cloth is made of the fibrous bark of the mulberry tree, which is beaten with a kind of mallet, and a glue, made of the hibiscus esculentus is employed to make the bark cohere. Some of these pieces are two or three yards wide and 50 yards long. Omai, a native of this island, was carried to England by captain Cook, and carried back by him in his last voyage. In 1799 king Pomare ceded the district of Matavia, on the N. side of this island, to some of the missionaries belonging to the London Missionary Society, through whose labors all the inhabitants of Otaheite and many of the neighbouring islands have been led to renounce idolatry. The sovereign himself became a decided convert to Christianity. A general reformation of manners has been effected, a number of schools established, the useful arts introduced, and civilization is rapidly advancing. Point Venus is in long. 149. 36. Oude, a province of Hindoostan, to the N. of Allahabad. It is subject to a nabob, whose dominions lie on both sides of the Ganges, occupying (with the exception of the district of Rampour) all the flat country between that river and the northern mountains, as well as the principal part of that fertile tract lying between the Ganges and Jumna, known by the name of Doosab, to within 40 m. of the city of Dehli. Oude and its dependencies are estimated at 360 m. in length from E. to W., and in breadth from 150 to 180. The nabob is in alliance with the British; and a brigade of the Bengal army is constantly stationed on its western frontier, which answers the purpose of covering Oude as well as Bengal, and of keeping the western states in awe. The capital is Lucknow.

Oude, a decayed city of Hindoostan, in the province of Oude, said to have been the capital of a great kingdom 1,200 years before the Christian era. It is frequently mentioned in the Mahabarat, a famous Hindoo work in Sanscrit, under the name of Adjudiah. But no traces of its former magnificence are left. It is seated on the Gogra, nearly adjoining Fyzabad.

Oudenard, a town of the Netherlands, in E. Flanders, in the middle of which is a fort. Here are manufactures of very fine linen and of curious tapestry. This town was besieged by the French in 1708, but the duke of Marlborough entirely routed their army. In 1745 it was taken by the French, restored by the peace of 1763, again surrendered to the French in 1794, and finally ceded to the Netherlands after the fall of Napoleon. It is seated on both sides the Scheldt, 12 m. S. of Ghent, and 29 W. of Brussels.

Oudenburg, a town of the Netherlands, in W. Flanders, 8 m. S. E. of Ostend.

Oudenwater, a fortified town of the Netherlands, in the province of Utrecht, the birth-place of the celebrated James Arminius; seated on the Little Yssel, 10 m. W. S. W. of Utrecht.

Oudipour, or Meyoor, a territory of Hindoostan, in the province of Agimere, belonging to the Rajpoots, and lying E. of the river Pudda. It consists in general of mountains, divided by narrow valleys accessible only by narrow passes, and abounds with fortresses. See Cheitor.

Oudipour, the capital of the above territory, is seated on the Banass, 134 m. S. S. W. of Agimere and 175 N. E. of Amedabad. Long. 74. 4. E., lat. 25. 28. N.

Owyhee, or Hawaii, the largest and most eastern of the Sandwich Islands, in the Pacific Ocean. Its length from N. to S. is 84 m. and its breadth 70. It is divided into 6 districts, 2 of which, on the N. E. side, are separated by a mountain, which rises in three peaks, the summits of which are 18,000 feet above the level of the sea; they are perpetually covered with snow, and may be seen at 40 leagues distance. To the N. of this mountain the coast consists of high and abrupt cliffs, down which fall many beautiful cascades; and the whole country is covered with cocoa-nut and bread-fruit trees. To the S. the ground is covered with cinders, and in many places has black streaks, which seem to mark the course of a lava that has flowed from the mountain to the shore. The southern promontory looks like the mere dregs of a volcano. The projecting headland is composed of broken and craggy rocks piled irregularly on one another, and terminating sharp points; yet amid these ruins, are many patches of rich soil, carefully laid out in plantations. The fields are enclosed by stone fences, and are interspersed with groves of cocoa-nut trees. Here Captain Cook, in 1779, fell a victim to a sudden resentment of the natives, with whom he unfortunately had a dispute. The inhabitants, formerly devoted to the most degrading superstition, have within a few years wholly renounced idolatry, and some American missionaries are settled amongst them. They are said to be naturally mild, friendly, and hospitable to strangers. The king and chiefs ceded this island to Great Britain in 1794. Long. 156. 0. W., lat. 19. 28. N.

Ozbovo, p.v. Jefferson Co. N. Y. 180 m. N. W. Albany.

Oxford, the capital of Oxfordshire, Eng. and a bishop's see. It is seated at the conflux of the Cherwell with the Thames, and has a canal to Braunston, in Northamptonshire. The city, with the suburbs, is of a circular form, 3 m. in circumference, and was anciently surrounded by walls, of which some remains are yet to be seen; as also of its extensive castle, the tower of which now serves for a county gaol. It has, besides the cathedral, 13 parish churches, a number of dissenting chapels, a famous university, a noble market-place, and a magnificent bridge. The university is generally supposed to have been a seminary for learning before the time of Alfred, although it owed its revival and consequence to his liberal patronage. Here are 20 colleges and four halls, several of which stand in the streets, and give the city an air of magnificence. The colleges are provided with sufficient revenues for the maintenance of a master, fellow, and students. In the halls the students live, either wholly, or in part, at their own expense. The colleges are, University, Baliol, Merton, Exeter, Oriel, Queen's, New, Lincoln, All Souls, Magdalen, Brasen Nose, Corpus Christi, Christ Church, Trinity, St. John Baptist, Jesus, Wadham, Pembroke, Worcester, and Hertford. Of these, the most ancient is University College, founded before the year 872; and to Christ Church College, begun by cardinal Wolsey and finished by Henry VIII., belongs the cathedral. The halls are Alban, Edmund, New Inn, and St. Mary Magdalen. Among the libraries in the university, the most distinguished is the Bodleian (founded by Sir Thomas Bodley), those of All Soul's College, Christ Church, Queen's, New, St. John, Exeter, and Corpus Christi.

Among other public buildings are the theatre, the Ashmolean museum, the Clarendon printing-house, the Radcliffe infirmary, and an observatory. Magdalen bridge, besides the beauty of its architecture, has this singularity, that more than half of it is on dry ground, and the rest covers two small stripes of the Cherwell; this bridge is 526 feet long. At Oxford, king John, compelled by his barons, summoned a parliament to meet in 1258, the proceedings of which were so disorderly that it was afterwards known by the name of the Mad Parliament. Charles I. assembled a parliament here in 1625, in consequence of the plague then raging in London; and in 1644 he summoned such of the members of both houses as were devoted to his interests: these were seceders from the parliament then sitting at Westminster. This city was distinguished for its attachment to that unfortunate king, who here held his court during the whole civil war. Without the town are many ruins of the fortifications erected in that war. Oxford is governed by a mayor, dependent on the chancellor and vice-chancellor of the university, and sends four members to parliament, two for the university and two for the city. 50 m. S. by E. of Coventry and 55 W. N. W. of London. Long. 1. 15. W., lat. 51. 46. N.

Oxfordshire, a county of England, bounded E.

by Buckinghamshire, W. by Gloucestershire, S. by Berkshire, and N. by Warwickshire and Northamptonshire. The extreme length is 48 m. and breadth 38, but its form is very irregular. It contains 450,000 acres, is divided into 14 hundreds and 207 parishes, has one city and 12 market towns and sends nine members to parliament. The soil though various, is fertile in corn and grass. The S. part, especially on the borders of Buckinghamshire, is hilly and woody, having a continuation of the Chiltern hills running through it. The N. W. part is also elevated and stony. The middle is, in general, a rich country, watered by numerous streams running from N. to S., and terminating in the Thames. Of these the most considerable are the Windrush, Evenlode, Cherwell, and Tame; the last, although an inconsiderable rivulet, has obtained some importance from having been supposed to give name to the Thames. The products of Oxfordshire are chiefly those common to the Midland farming counties; and a great improvement has taken place of late years in the agricultural system. Its hills yield ochre, pipe-clay, and other earths, useful for various purposes. Corn and malt are conveyed from it by the Thames to the metropolis; and the Oxford Canal affords a direct water communication with Liverpool, Manchester, and the Wednesbury collieries, as well as with London and Bristol.

Pachamac, or Pachacama, a town of Peru, in the province of Cercade, situate in a valley of its name, formerly beautified with a magnificent temple, built by the incas, in which the Spaniards, when they conquered Peru, found immense riches. It is 18 m. S. S. E. of Lima.

Pacheta, a town and fort of Bengal, formerly the capital of a district of its name, which is now included in the government of Burdwan. It stands near the Dummooda, 10 m. N. E. of Rongatpour.

Pachuca, a town of Mexico, noted for the rich silver mines in its vicinity, 56 m. N. by E. of Mexico. Long. 100. 41. W., lat. 20. 44. N.

Pacific Ocean, otherwise called the South Sea, lying between Asia and America. It is the largest ocean in the world, extending over more than one-third of its whole surface, and being upwards of 10,000 m. in breadth. When Magellan entered this ocean, through the dangerous strait that bears his name, he sailed three months and 30 days in a uniform direction to the N. W. without discovering land. In the distress he suffered in this voyage, before he discovered the Ladrone Islands he had the consolation of enjoying such calm and gentle weather, with fair winds, that he gave this ocean the name of Pacific. The Spaniards, on passing the isthmus of Darien from N. to S., at the first discovery of this ocean, named it the South Sea; but with respect to America, it is more properly the western ocean. On one side of the equator it is called the North, and on the other the South Pacific.

Paderborn, an ancient principality of Westphalia, 40 m. long and 25 broad, remarkable for its bacon and venison. It now belongs to Prussia.

Paderborn, a fortified town of Prussian Westphalia, formerly capital of a principality of the same name. The rivulet Pader rises under the high altar of the cathedral, and in the collegiate church are the remains of St. Blase. The most remarkable of the convents is the college formerly belonging to the Jesuits, and here is also a celebrated university. It is 52 m. E. S. E. of Munster. Long. 8. 55. E., lat. 51. 41. N.

Padron, a town of Spain, in Galicia, seated on the Ulla, 12 m. S. of Compostella.

Padstow, a town in Cornwall, Eng. with a convenient harbour, and some coasting trade. It is seated at the mouth of the Camel, on the Bristol Channel, 30 m. W. of Launceston and 243 W. by S. of London.

Padua, a province of Austrian Italy, in the government of Venice, 40 m. long and 35 broad, bounded by Rovigo, Verona, Vicenza, Treviso, and Venice. It is well watered, and one of the most fertile countries in Italy.

Padua, a fortified city of Italy, capital of the above province, and a bishop's see. It is 7 m. in circumference, but much less considerable than formerly; for great part of the area within the walls is unbuilt, and the town in general so thinly inhabited that grass grows in many of the streets. The houses are built with piazzas, which when the town was in a flourishing state, may have had a magnificent appearance; but they now rather give it a gloomy air. The cathedral is one of the richest in Italy: in the sacristy is a statue of the celebrated Petrarch, who was a canon of the church, and left to it a part of his library. The Franciscan church is dedicated to St. Antonio, the patron of the city, whose body is enclosed in a sarcophagus, under an altar in the middle of the chapel. Near this church is the school of St. Antonio, where many of the actions of the saint are painted in fresco, some of them by Titian. The church of St. Justina is remarkable for its rich mosaic pavement. The hall of the town-house is one of the largest in Europe, and contains the cenotaph of Livy, who was a native of Padua. The university, once so celebrated, is now on the decline. Here are manufactures of cloth, silk, ribands, and leather, all on a small scale. Padua was taken by the French in 1796. It is seated on the Brenta and Bachiglione, in a fine plain, 20 m. W. by S. of Venice. Long. 11. 53. E., lat. 45. 14. N.

Padula, a town of Naples, in Principato Citra, 14 m. N. of Policastro.

Pagahn, a decayed city of Birmah, anciently capital of a province of the same name. It is said to have been abandoned in the 13th century in consequence of a divine admonition. The remains of its ancient splendor are numerous mouldering temples, and the vestiges of a fort. It is seated on the Irrawaddy, 110 m. S. W. of Ummerapoora. Long. 94. 34. E., lat. 21. 10. N.

Palermo, p.t. Waldo Co. Me. 80 m. N. E. Portland. Pop. 1,258.

Palermo, a fortified city of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, capital of the island, and an archbishop's see. It stands on a bay of the same name, on the N. coast, near the extremity of a kind of natural amphitheatre, formed by high and rocky mountains. The country between the city and the mountains is one of the richest plains in the world; the whole appearing a magnificent garden, filled with fruitful trees and watered by fountains and rivulets. The two principal streets intersect each other in the centre of the city, where they form a handsome square, called the Ottangolo, from the centre of which is seen the whole of these noble streets, and the four elegant gates which terminate them, each at the distance of half a mile. The Porto Felice opens to the Marino, a delightful walk, which has on one side the wall of the city, and on the other the sea; and in the centre is an elegant kind of temple, frequently made use of as an orchestra. The churches of Palermo are upwards of 300, and many of them very rich and magnificent. The cathedral is a large Gothic structure, supported within by 80 columns of oriental granite, and divided into a great number of chapels, some of which are extremely rich, particularly that of St. Rosalia, the patroness of Palermo. The relics of this saint are preserved in a large box of silver, enriched with precious stones; and they are considered as the greatest treasures of the city. Here are also found the tombs of several of the ancient Norman kings, and of the emperors Henry VI. and Frederic II. of the finest porphyry. This city has suffered greatly at different periods by earthquakes and inundations. The harbour, defended by two castles, is dangerously open to the sea from the N. E.; and even at the anchoring place, ships are in danger when a westerly wind rushes through the valley of Colli between the mountains. About the middle of the 11th century the Norman king, Roger, established silk manufactures in this city, by means of prisoners taken in his war with the Greeks, and they still flourish, though not so lucrative since the manufacture has extended to Italy. One mile from Palermo is a celebrated convent of Capuchins, in which is a vault, made use of as a receptacle for the dead. It consists of 4 wide passages, each about 40 feet in length, with arches along the sides, in which the bodies are set upright, clothed in coarse garments, with their heads, arms, and feet bare. On the floor are handsome trunks, containing the bodies of persons of distinction, the keys of which are kept by the relations. In 1799 when the French made themselves masters of Naples, Palermo became the residence of the court; at present it is the seat of the viceroy of the Sicilian parliament and of the chief boards of the island administration. 130 m. W. of Messina, and 200 S. by W. of Naples. Long. 13. 23. E., lat. 38. 7. N.

Palastine, a country of Syria, so called from the Philistines, who inhabited its sea-coast. In the Scriptures it is styled the Land of Canaan, and the Promised Land: it is also called Judaea, from the patriarch Judah; and the Holy Land, from its having been the scene of the birth, ministry, and death of Jesus Christ. It is divided from the other parts of Syria on the N. by Mount Libanus, and on the E. by the river Jordan and the Dead Sea; Arabia Petrea on the S., and the Mediterranean on the W. It is in general a fertile country, abounding where cultivated, with corn, wine, and oil; and it might supply the neighbouring country with all these, as it anciently did, were the present inhabitants equally industrious. The parts about Jerusalem are the most mountainous and rocky; but they feed numerous herds and flocks, and yield plenty of honey, with excellent wine and oil; and the valleys produce large crops of corn. This country has been conquered and occupied by such a variety of foreign races that it is difficult to say which forms the basis of its present population. It now belongs to the Turkish empire, and is included in the pachalics of Acre and Damascus, the former comprehending the sea-coast and the latter extending over the interior.

Palmerston Isle, an island in the S. Pacific, discovered by Cook in 1774. It consists of about 10 islets, connected by a reef of coral rocks, and lying in a circular direction; the principal one not exceeding a m. in circumference, nor more than three feet above the level of the sea. It abounds with cocoa-nuts, scurvygrass, and the wharra-tree, but has no inhabitants. Long. 162. 57. W., lat. 18. 0. S.

Palmyra, or Tadmor, once a magnificent city of Syria, originally built by king Solomon, in the midst of a sandy desert, bounded on three sides by a chain of high mountains. On the decline of the Macedonian empire in the E., it became the capital of a principality, under the name of Palmyra; and it declared for the Romans, on Adriamarching his army through Syria to Egypt. The city flourished and increased to the time of Aurelian, when it resisted the Roman power under queen Zenobia, who was at length taken captive, and led in triumph through the streets of Rome. Soon afterwards the inhabitants massacred the soldiers who had been left in garrison; this occasioned the return of Aurelius, who, having made himself master of the place, caused the inhabitants to be destroyed, and gave up the city to pillage. Its stupendous ruins were visited, in 1751, by Mr. Wood, who published a splendid account of them in 1753. The inhabitants consist of about 40 Arab families, living in mud cottages, erected within the spacious court of a once magnificent temple. 100 m. S. E. of Aleppo. Long. 38. 50. E., lat. 33. 20. N.

Palto, a famous lake of Thibet, lying to the S. W. of Lassa, about 12 m. S. of the river Samboo. It is represented as a wide trench, of about 6 m. broad, surrounding an island 30 m. long and 20 broad. On the W. shore of this island is a monastery, and the seat of the Lamissa Turcopamo, or the Great Regenerate, in whom the Thibetians think that a divine spirit is regenerated, as it is in the Great Lama. The word lamissa, is the feminine of lama, which signifies a priest.

Pamelia, a township of Jefferson Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,263.

Pamiers, a town of France, department of Arriège, and a bishop's see. In the vicinity is a mineral spring. It is seated on the Arriège, 36 m. S. by E. of Toulouse. Long. 1. 35. E., lat. 43. 6. N.

Pamlico Sound, a kind of inland sea, on the coast of N. Carolina, 100 m. long and from 10 to 20 broad, separated in its whole length from the Atlantic, by a beach of sand, hardly a mile wide. It has several inlets, but that of Ocracoke, in lat. 35. 10. N., is the only one that will admit vessels of burden.

Pampas, the name given in South Africa to the wide prairies or plains South of the Rio de la Plata. The great plain on the east of the Cordilleras, is about 900 m. in breadth, and divided into regions of different climates and produce. On leaving Buenos Ayres, the first region is covered, for 180 m. with clover and thistles; the second region (480 m.) produces long grass, without a weed; and the third, reaching the base of the Cordilleras, is a grove of low trees and shrubs, in which such beautiful order is observed that one may gallop between them in every direction. The two last have nearly the same appearance throughout the year. The trees and shrubs are evergreens, and the grass only changes from green to brown. The first region varies with the four seasons. In winter the leaves of the thistle are luxuriant, and the whole surface has the appearance of a turnip field. The clover is also rich and strong, and the wild cattle are grazing at full liberty. In spring the clover has vanished, and the leaves of the thistle are extended. In a month the whole region becomes a wood of thistles, ten or eleven feet high, in full bloom. The stems of the thistles are so close and strong, that, independent of the prickles, they form an impenetrable barrier, which has arisen so suddenly, that an invading army might be imprisoned by them. Before summer is over the thistles are dead, and the violence of the pampero or hurricane levels them with the ground, where they rapidly decompose, and the clover again quickly appears. If millions of inhabitants could be suddenly placed on these pampas they would have nothing to do but to drive out their cattle to graze, and without preparation plough what ground they pleased. But they can hardly be said to be peopled. Between the few settled inhabitants or gauchos, and the roving Indians who inhabit the south part of the pampas, a cruel exterminating war is carried on. The Indians always on horseback, are however, incapable of acting on foot, and are easily repulsed. The climate of the pampas is subject to great difference of temperature, though the gradual changes are very regular. The winter is as cold as an English November. The summer is very oppressively hot. But the whole pampas enjoy an atmosphere as beautiful and salubrious as the most healthy parts of Greece and Italy, without the malaria. The south-west wind or pampero, generated by the Andes, rushes over the plains with a violence which it is almost impossible to withstand; but they make the weather afterwards particularly healthy and agreeable.

Pampelonne, a town of France, department of Tarn, 15 m. N. by E. of Alby.

Pampliega, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, 12 m. S. W. of Burgos.

Pampola, or Pampeluna, a city of Spain, capital of Upper Navarre, and a bishop's see, with a strong citadel, and a university. Paraguay, an extensive country of S. America, bounded on the N. by Amazonia, E. by Brazil, S. by Patagonia, and W. by Chile and Peru. It contains numerous lakes and rivers, of the latter, the three principal are the Parana, Paraguay, and Uruguay, the united streams of which form the celebrated Rio de la Plata. These rivers annually overflow their banks. The climate is in general moist and temperate, though in some places it is cold. In the temperate parts the soil is extremely fertile, producing grain, beans, peas, cotton, tobacco, and the valuable herb called paraguay, which is peculiar to this country, and the infusion of which is drank instead of tea. Here are also a variety of fruits and very rich pastures; but the country is destitute of woods. Cattle, sheep, horses, and mules are in great abundance; of the last many thousands were annually sent to Peru. In the mountains toward Tucuman, the condor, the largest bird of the vulture tribe, is not unfrequent; and the ostrich is found in the wide plains. Several independent tribes of indigenes live in the interior, on the Rio Grande; one of them, called Abipones, are a warlike race, and, by a novelty in American manners, chiefly cavalry, securing and taming the wild horses introduced by the Spaniards. In 1515 the Spaniards discovered this country by sailing up the Rio de la Plata, and, in 1535, founded the town of Buenos Ayres. In 1580 the Jesuits were admitted into these fertile regions, and, in the next century, founded the famous missions of Paraguay. In 1767 Spain exchanged the colonies on the E. shore of the Uruguay for the Portuguese colony of St. Sacramento, which caused that river to become the boundary of the respective possessions of the two crowns. In 1767 the court expelled the Jesuits, and the natives were put upon the same footing with the other Indians of the Spanish part of S. America.

Paraguay revolted from the government of Spain at the same time with the neighbouring provinces. Soon after the declaration of independence the direction of affairs fell into the hands of Doctor Francia a native of the country, who procured himself to be declared Dictator for life. This government has continued to the present moment the most arbitrary and despotic rule on the face of the earth; yet his administration has been generally equitable. All intercourse with foreigners has been avoided, and those who have entered the country have experienced great difficulties in returning. Asuncion is the capital.

Peraiba, a province of Brazil, between those of Rio Grande and Tamarica. It abounds in sugar canes, bram-wood, tobacco, and cotton. The chief town, which is of the same name, is seated on the river Paraiba. The Dutch obtained possession of it in 1635, and fortified it with a slight rampart; but the Portuguese retook it soon after.

Paramaribo, the capital of Surinam, Guiana, and the chief place of the Dutch colonies in S. America. It has a strong but small citadel, and a noble road for shipping, where there are seldom fewer than 80 vessels, loading coffee, sugar, cotton, and indigo. The streets are strait, and lined with orange, shaddock, tamarind, and lemon trees, in continual bloom. It surrendered to the English in 1799 and in 1803. It is situate on the E. side of the river Surinam, 16 m. from its mouth. Long. 55. 25. W., lat 5. 48. N.

Parana, a province of Paraguay, so named from a large river, which receives the Paraguay at Gorientes, and afterwards, joining the Uruguay, forms the river Plata.

Parochitz, a town and castle of Prussian Silesia, with a considerable manufacture of cloth; seated on the Katzbach, 10 m. N. E. of Leignitz.

Pardebitz, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Chrudin, with a fortified castle and a manufacture of knives and sword blades. It is seated on the Elbe, 23 m. E. by S. of Prague. Long. 15. 41 E., lat. 49. 58. N.

Parachia. See Peres.

Paranza, a sea-port of Istria, on a peninsula in the gulf of Venice, with a harbour for large vessels. It is 28 m. S. by W. of Capo d'Istria. Long. 13. 50. E., lat. 45. 18. S.

Parga, a sea-port on the coast of Albania, opposite to the southern point of the island of Corfu, memorable as the only place which bade defiance to the arms of Ali Pasha, tyrant of Albania, to whom it was eventually surrendered on condition of his paying an indemnity to those of the inhabitants who should refuse to remain. The evacuation took place in 1819, most of the inhabitants removing to the Ionian islands. 30 m. S. W. of Joannina.

Paria, a province of Colombia, lying to the S. E. of Cumana, on the banks of the Orouoco, and including the delta of that river. On the N. of this province, between Cumana and the island of Trinidad, is a large bay, called the Gulf of Paria.

Paria, the capital of the above province. Here are some silver mines, and its choicest, made from the milk both of sheep and cows, are in high esteem. It is 140 m. W. N. W. of Plata. Long. 68. 32. W., lat. 18. 30. S.

Paridrong, a strong town of Thibet, on the borders of Bootan, 45 m. W. N. W. of Tassaudon.

Parilla, or Santa, a town of Peru, in the province of Lima, at the mouth of a river of the same name, 80 m. S. E. of Truxillo, and 280 N. W. of Lima. Long. 77. 50. W., lat. 8. 56. S.

Parima, a lake of S. America, near the borders of Amazonia and Guiana, of a square form, 80 m. long and 40 broad. It seems to be a kind of inundation formed by the Orinoco; for that river enters on the N. and issues on the W. side of the lake, near its N. W. angle. From the S. E. of this lake issues the White River, called also the Parima, which flows S. to the Black River, and thence S. E. to the river Amazon. To the W. of this lake, before the main stream of the Orinoco turns to the N., there are two other branches that flow from it to the Black River. Hence there are three communications between those two great rivers, the Orinoco and the Amazon.

Paris, the capital of France, and of civilized Europe, lies on both banks and occupies two islets of the Seine. This city, which pretends to a rivalry in arts and elegancies with Athens, and in magnificence with Thebes, had the meanest commencement. Julius Cæsar found the principal islet, now called "the city" (la cite), covered with huts, and serving as a retreat for fishermen of the tribe of Gauls called "Parisii." The surrounding woods and marshes, and the waters of the Seine, which had hitherto protected these barbarians, were but a weak obstacle to the Roman legionaries, upon whose approach they burned their huts and fled further into the woods. Cæsar, having completed the conquest of Gaul, held a conference with the chiefs of the Gallic hordes in this islet, and approving the site, laid in it the foundation of a city, called by the Romans "Lutetia Parisiorum," from the name of the tribe, and the word "Loutouhesi," by which the natives designated the cluster of huts which had disappeared. The new city improved rapidly under the influence of Roman laws, arts, and administration. During the reign of Charlemagne, who, amidst his conquests, never lost sight of the arts of civilization, Paris advanced in arts and letters as well as wealth and extent. The adventurous and roving Normans, tempted by the wealth of the city, and despising the feeble successors of Charlemagne, who had abandoned the capital as a patrimony to hereditary counts, plundered it three times, after short intervals—in 845, 857, and 879. Under the third or Capetian race, it improved still more rapidly than before. It became the fixed royal residence and seat of government; the capital of the kingdom in fact as well as in name. Philip Augustus added to its strength and beauty by many new edifices, by paving the streets, and by surrounding the whole city with deep fosse and thick wall defended by five hundred towers. Paris at this time had sixteen gates, and covered a surface of seven hundred and thirty-nine square acres. Louis IX. (St. Louis) built hospitals and schools, reformed the more barbarous and vexatious "customs" (laws), regulated the administration of justice, and created a police. Paris was taken in 1426 by the English, who were compelled to abandon it in 1436. Francis I. had the glory of introducing into Paris science, literature and the fine arts. The Grecian orders of architecture were now adopted for the first time, and the interior of the new edifices adorned with sculpture and the paintings of the Italian masters. Henry IV. erected the Pont Neuf, and laid out several squares or places in the old city on the islets in the Seine, hitherto the quarter of the court. Paris is indebted to Louis XIV. for a great portion of its magnificence:—for its noble and healthful Boulevards;—for the triumphal arches (of which two are splendid monuments) by which it is entered at the gates of St. Denis, St. Martin, St. Antoine, and St. Bernard;—for the Place Vendôme and Place des Victoires;—for the colonnade of the Louvre; the Hospital of Invalids; the garden of the Tuileries, designed by Lenotre, under the immediate inspection of Colbert;—for the promenades and plantations of the Champs Elysees. The Revolution came, and with it the genius of devastation for a time. The works of art only are a permanent loss, and fortunately they were neither many, nor irreparable chefs d'œuvre;—whilst the public health, convenience, and beauty of the town, have gained incalculably by the removal or desecration of the churches and convents. Spacious and convenient markets, open and well-built streets or other edifices of great public ornament and utility, now occupy the sites of such religious houses as were destroyed; and those left standing, but desecrated, have been converted into prisons, penitentiaries, hospitals, colleges, schools or other public establishments for the purposes of society or charity. Paris is under eternal obligations to Bonaparte: he did more for it than even Louis XIV. He combined, in a greater degree, the useful with the magnificent. Despotic as he was, he saw that the mass of the people was now a power which must not be dazzled merely, as in the time of Louis XIV., but conciliated and served. His designs are said to have been essentially his own. It seems most probable that they could have been conceived only by the same mind which had the force, energy and resources to execute them. He freed the bridges and banks of the Seine from the embarrassment and deformity of the old houses by which they were still crowded; built magnificent quays and wharves; and erected four bridges of remarkable beauty, as monuments of art. He not only conceived (for even the conception was a great merit), but had nearly executed, at his fall, the Canal de l'Oureq. He distributed the public supply of water by fifteen new and abundant fountains, of which some are beautiful specimens of architecture. The immense architectural and sculptural mass called "the Fountain of the Elephant" was left by him, and still remains unfinished. The people, not merely of Paris, but of the whole kingdom, are indebted to him for those spacious markets, so commodiously arranged for the sale of every kind of produce; for public stores, especially the wine stores, which surprise by their vastness, the happy ingenuity of their distribution, and their architectural grandeur. He erected, near the barriers, five abattoirs or slaughter-houses; and thus relieved the town from the inconvenient and dangerous presence of herds of cattle, the revolting spectacle of blood, and the noxious miasmata of butchery and tallow-melting. The vast granary of reserve, destined by him to protect the people of Paris against famine and the change of seasons, now unfinished or abandoned, remains a monument of the instability of all human power and the uncertainty of all human projects. He cleared the Place du Carrousel, between the Louvre and the Tuileries, of its obstructions and nuisances; adorned it with a triumphal arch; completed the Louvre; filled its gallery with sculpture and paintings. The garden of the Tuileries owes much of its magnificence to the noble vista which he opened by the rue Castiglione to the triumphal column in the Place Vendôme;—the opposite view of the Chamber of Deputies, with its noble portico, on the left bank of the Seine; and the unfinished but grand triumphal arch of Neuilly. Many of the public buildings, canals, and other public works left unfinished by Bonaparte, have been carried on, and some have been completed, since the restoration of the house of Bourbon. A new quarter, as it is called, was begun, in 1823, in the western suburb of Paris, touching the Champs Elysees, extending to Chaillot, and spreading above the Chaussée d'Antin. The style of structure is elegant, and the scale within the reach of ordinary fortunes. A second quarter opens by its main street, which is spacious and planted with rows of trees, a communication between two main points of the faubourgs Montmartre and St. Martin. The progress of all these, however, has been slow, and in some parts suspended; and some generations will probably have passed away before the "Ville de François Premier" and Nouvelle Athenes," with their brilliant associations, or the "Petit Londres," with its national rivalry, are monuments of any thing but magnificent projects, and the want of capital or perseverance. Great undertakings are rarely, if ever, completed by private enterprise in Paris: they have been projected and executed only by the government. The palace of the Exchange, considered the noblest edifice of the kind in Europe, was completed and opened for the transaction of commercial business, and for the sittings of the tribunal of commerce, since the accession of Charles X.

It is difficult to give within short limits a coup d'œil of so crowded, diversified, and even disorderly, a mass as the French capital,—its churches, palaces, public buildings, and monuments of art. (Of its churches, the most remarkable are the cathedral of Notre Dame, in the old city,—a large and lofty edifice, with two high and massive towers, presenting a style of architecture imposing and curious, and well executed for its early date;—the church of St. Eustache, a model of light and graceful classic architecture;—the churches of St. Roch and St. Sulpice, modern edifices in a grand and noble style;—that of St. Genevieve, built near the close of the last century,—desecrated during the Revolution into a Pantheon for the remains of the great men of France, with the simple and sublimely affecting inscription—"Aux grands hommes la patrie reconnoissante," and re-desecrated in 1830;—admired for its dome,—sustained by the mass of the building in the form of a Greek cross at its intersection—its principal façade and peristyle of twenty fluted Corinthian columns imitated from the Pantheon at Rome. Paris boasts several palaces, of which the principal are the Tuileries, with its vast open court and imposing façade on the one side, and its public garden, adorned with alleys of forest trees, terraces, plantations, basins, and copies in marble and bronze of the most celebrated pieces of sculpture;—the Louvre, with its gallery of works of art, and its colonnade, regarded as a specimen of the nearest approach to perfection in architecture; the Palace or Chamber of Deputies, with a grand Corinthian portico, and several statues of colossal size,—the beautiful Palais Bourbon—both contiguous, immediately on the left bank of the Seine;—the old and majestic Luxembourg, or Chamber of Peers, with its two grand pavilion wings and central quadrangle surmounted by a cupola, and its splendid garden opening on the observatory; the Palace of Justice, in the old city, inhabited by kings of the present dynasty down to the twelfth in succession, now occupied by the courts of justice; the Palais Royal, inhabited and recently repaired by the duke of Orleans, with its adjoining public garden, galleries and shops,—concentrating as in a focus, wealth and idleness, literature, industry and the arts, gaming and every other species of dissipation and depravity.

The chief public edifices are the Hospital or Hotel of Invalids, with its gilded dome, its ornamented façade, with central Ionic pilasters, and a planted esplanade extending before it;—the Hotel des Monnaies, or mint, in which also all national medals are struck, with its colonnade, arcades, and statues, forming a noble façade towards the Seine, on its left bank;—the Observatory, communicating by a grand avenue with the Luxembourg;—the Exchange, already mentioned, built in a simple and noble style, forming a parallelogram 212 feet long and 126 broad, with a peristyle of sixty-six Corinthian columns.

Three of the sixteen bridges over the Seine merit particular notice:—the bridge of the Garden of Plants, formerly called Pont d'Austerlitz, with five arches of iron, remarkable for its elegance and solidity; the Pont d'Jena, changed to that of "the Invalids," at the instance of Blucher, who was actually laying a train to blow it up in 1815; and between these, from the Louvre to the Institute, the Pont des Arts, incomparably light and graceful, and used only by foot passengers.

Of the public monuments of art, the most perfectly beautiful is the bronze column in the Place Vendôme, modelled upon that of Trajan at Rome, but exceeding its proportions by a twelfth. The most remarkable merit in this column, perhaps is, that, presenting in relief on its pedestal the anclastic trophies of modern war, in every variety of arms and costume, it yet seems perfectly in the classic and antique style and taste. The triumphal arch of the Carousel, modelled upon that of Septimius Severus at Rome, is unexceptionably beautiful in itself, but small in proportion to the surrounding area, and rendered for a time still more disproportionate by the removal of the celebrated Venetian horses of Lysippus with their car from its summit, in 1815. These, however, have been recently replaced by an exact copy in bronze. It has, like its model, three arcades in front, with an additional transverse arcade. The modern triumphal arch at Neuilly exceeds the arch of the Carousel, and even those of Louis XIV. at the gates of St. Denis and St. Martin, in grandeur and advantage of position, rather than beauty. Colossal statues have been re-erected to Henry IV. on the Pont Neuf, and Louis XIV. in the Place des Victoires.

Judging by the daily congregation of thousands of both sexes in the open air,—young men idly lolling or lounging,—old men, with even a certain air of gravity, wasting life in the coffee-houses and public gardens,—the gaming-houses equally public and crowded,—one would be disposed to pronounce the people of Paris a race the most frivolous, idle, and depraved. But the loungers and gamblers are, to a considerable extent, congregated from all parts of Europe; and the old men are small annuitants, content with their actual means of subsistence,—without further increase by industry or speculation. Science, literature, and the fine arts, are at the same time cultivated in a still greater proportion of numbers by the studious and the industrious, and with every advantage which schools of public instruction, libraries, and museums, can afford. The public schools and colleges forming component branches of one great system of public education in medicine, jurisprudence, and the military art, abstract and experimental science, literature, the fine and useful arts, from the institute down to the two admirable institutions for the instruction of the blind and the deaf and dumb, with appropriate and some noble edifices devoted to them, and lectures by eminent professors, either gratuitous or on moderate terms, are too numerous to be detailed. The chief public libraries are five in number:—the Royal Library, containing 500,000 vols., 100,000 MSS., 100,000 medals, and 1,500,000 engravings; the Mazarine Library, 93,000 vols., and 41,000 MSS.; the Library of the Arsenal, 170,000 vols., 6,000 MSS.; the Library of St. Genevieve, 110,000 vols., and 2,000 MSS.; the City Library, 42,000 vols. The principal museums are that, or rather those, of the Garden of Plants,—an incomparable temple of natural science in every branch, raised chiefly by the illustrious Buffon, and his worthy successor, the late count Lacepede; the Louvre, still containing 1,200 pictures and 500 pieces of sculpture, among which are many chefs d'œuvre; and the Conservatory of Useful Arts (Arts et Metiers), containing specimens or models of the machinery and instruments used in every branch of manufacture.

Paris is the great centre, not only of French but of continental intellect in literature and science. From its press issue the most valuable, if not the greatest number, of literary publications; and it has a still more decided lead in scientific research and discovery. Paris is also as decidedly the first manufacturing town of France. Its principal manufacturing establishments called royal, are three:—the Gobelins tapestry, to which that of La Savonniere has been united; the manufactory of glass, which employs 2,700 men; and the porcelain manufactory at Sevres, remarkable not only for the value of its productions, but for its curious museum of all the objects connected with the art, ranged in order. Paris also excels in many of the commonly used articles of luxury and fashion,—in male and female dress, jewelry, wrought gold and silver, watches, clocks, furniture, carriages, &c. So strong is the tendency to trading industry, that its exports have increased since the Revolution to a degree unprecedented in the history of commerce.

Society has become essentially changed in Paris since the Revolution. The nobles have lost their importance, if not existence, as a caste. That numerous aggregate of families formerly called the "court," has disappeared. Wealth, however, is not the first distinction, nor has it the same weight in obtaining access to good company, in Paris as in other places. The Parisian society of men of letters and artists is, perhaps, the most intellectual, interesting and polished, in existence,—from the fund of knowledge and accomplishment which it contains, and the passing admixture of European rank and talents. The Parisians are doubtless polished and artificial in their manners; but they are also really social and obliging: and the many hospitals which they support for the helpless of both sexes and every age,—of which 7 contain 3,156 beds,—with, moreover, several bureaux for the distribution of private domiciliary relief,—sufficiently prove that they are humane and charitable. Their love of amusement and pleasure is attested by their crowded public walks, their 3,500 coffee-houses, and twelve theatres.

Paris lies in north lat. 43. 50. 11.,—long. 20. 11. (reckoning, with the French astronomers, from the western point of the Ile de Ferro.)—98 leagues S. E. of London, 250 leagues S. W. of Copenhagen, 380 leagues S. W. of Stockholm, 500 leagues S. W. of St. Petersburg, 600 leagues S. W. of Moscow, 324 leagues W. of Cracow, 300 leagues S. W. of Dantzic, 216 leagues S. W. of Constantinople, 333 leagues N. W. of Naples, 260 leagues N. N. W., of Rome, 230 leagues W. N. W. of Venice, 107 leagues N. W. Bern, 148 leagues W. N. W. of Zurich, 100 leagues W. N. W. of Basle, 280 leagues N. by E. of Madrid, 350 leagues N. E. of Lisbon. Its area is 10,600 square acres, of 100 perches each; its circumference, by the Boulevards, about six leagues; its diameter about two leagues; and its pop. 900,000. It is divided into 12 municipal districts, called arrondissements; 9 on the right and 3 on the left bank of the Seine,—with a mayor and justice of peace in each; and these arrondissements are again subdivided into forty-eight quarters, each with a commissary of police. The municipal administration and police of Paris are wholly in the hands of the executive government.

Parma, a duchy of Italy, under which name are included the duchies of Parma Proper, Placenza, and Guastalla. It is bounded on the W. and N. by the Milanese, E. by the Modenese, and S. by Tuscan and Genoa. The soil is fertile in corn, wine, oil, hemp, and pasturage; and there are some inconsiderable mines of copper and silver. The celebrated Parmesan cheese is no longer made in this country, but at Lodi, in the Milanese, and some other places. By the treaty of Paris, in 1814, this duchy was given to the ex-empress Maria Louise.

Parma, an ancient, rich, populous, and handsome town of Italy, capital of the foregoing duchy. It has a university, a magnificent cathedral, and the largest opera-house in Europe, which has seats for 8,000 people. The dome, and the church of St. John, are painted by the famous Correggio, who was a native of this place. The other most remarkable places are the ducal palace, with its gallery and collection of artificial curiosities; the large Benedictine convent, in which 12,000 soldiers were quartered in 1794; the Palazzo Giardini, a ducal palace, connected with the town; and the promenade between the town and citadel. Charles, king of the Two Sicilies, carried away a library from this place to Naples, which contained 18,000 volumes, and a very valuable cabinet of curiosities, with a rich collection of medals. The inhabitants, about 36,000, trade in silk, and silk stockings. In 1734 a bloody battle was fought here between the Austrians and the French and Sardinians, in which the former were defeated. Parma is situated on a river of the same name, which divides it into two parts, united by three bridges, 40 m. N. W. of Modena and 60 S. E. of Milan. Long. 10. 30. E., lat. 44. 50. N.

Parnassus, or Parnaso, a celebrated mountain in Greece. It has two heads, one of which was famous for being consecrated to Apollo and the Muses, and the other to Bacchus. It is the highest in Greece, and has a fine fountain, supposed to be the ancient Castalia. 8 m. N. of Livadia.

Paro, or Porogong, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of its name in the province of Bootan, with a castle, the residence of a governor. It is famous for the manufacture of idols, and the forging of swords, daggers, and arrows. It stands on the Patchieu, in a fertile valley, 20 m. S. by E. of Tassasodon.

Paros, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, one of the Cyclades, to the W. of Naxia. It is 10 m. long and eight broad, and the soil is well cultivated. The trade consists in wheat, barley, wine, and pulse, and in calicoes. It formerly produced a great deal of oil, but the Venetian army burnt all the olive trees. This island was anciently dedicated to Bacchus, on account of its excellent wines; and has been so famous for its marble that the best carvers would make use of no other. The statuaries Phidias and Praxiteles were natives of this island; and the famous Arundelian marbles at Oxford were brought from this place.

Paros, or Parechia, the capital of the Isle of Paros, and a bishop's see. It was anciently the largest and most powerful town of the Cyclades; but is greatly decayed. The walls of the castle are built of ancient pieces of marble, and most of the columns are placed long-wise; some of them, that stand upright, support cornices of amazing size. The natives build their houses of marble, which they find ready cut to their hands; but they take no care to place the pieces in a regular manner; their fields likewise are inclosed with friezes, altars, and basso-relievos. The present inhabitants are so ignorant that instead of great sculptors, and skilful architects, they have nothing but carvers of mortars and salt-cellars. Paros is situate on the W. coast of the island. Long. 25. 44. E., lat. 37. 8. N.

Parsonsfield, p.t. York Co. Me. Pop. 2,465.

Partenkirch, a town of Bavaria, 48 m. S. S. W. of Munich.

Parthenay, a town of France, department of Deux Sevres, with a considerable trade in cattle and corn, and manufactures of serge, hats, leather, and earthenware. It is seated on the Thoue, 21 m. S. of Thouars and 28 m. N. E. of Niort.

Partoncraig, a ferry-town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, near the mouth of the frith of Tay, 9 m. N. N. W. of St. Andrew.

Para, a town and fort of Brazil, in the jurisdiction of Para; situate on the N. side of the head of the estuary of the Amazon, 200 m. from the ocean. Long. 54. 20. W., lat. 1. 50. S.

Parys, a mountain of Wales, on the N. W. coast of the Isle of Anglesey, famous for a copper mine, which is wrought similarly to a stone quarry open to day. This mine was not opened till 1768, and the quantity of ore is prodigious. The purest part is exported raw to the smelting works at Swansea and other places: the most impure is calcined on the spot, and deprived of its sulphur, which is sublimed, and afterwards formed into rolls of brimstone. Quantities of nearly pure copper are obtained from the waters beneath the bed of ore, by the intervention of iron. A lead ore, rich in silver, is also found in this mountain. The smelting and boiling houses are in the valley below, near the sea, and at Amlwch is a commodious haven for vessels employed in the copper and brimstone trade.

Pas, a town of France, department of Pas de Calais, 12 m. S. W. of Arras.

into the gulf of Mexico. It is barred at the mouth against vessels drawing more than 5 feet water.

Pas de Calais, a department of France, containing the provinces of Artois and Bourbonnois. It has a superficial area of 2,500 sq. m. with 570,000 inhabitants. The climate is humid and changeable, several districts are marshy, but the soil in general is fertile in corn, hemp, flax, &c. Arras is the capital.

Pasewalk, a town of Prussian Pomerania, near which are some iron works. It stands on the Ucker, 28 m. W. of Stettin.

Pasqua, a town of Mexico, in Xalisco, 100 m. S. S. W. of Compostella.

Pasquaro, a town of Mexico, in Mechoacan, 24 m. S. W. of Mechoacan.

Pasquotank, a county of N. Carolina. Pop. 8,618. Elizabeth is the capital.

Passage, a sea-port of Spain, in Biscay, between those of Fontarabia and St. Sebastian, 3 m. E. of the latter.

Passaic, a river of New Jersey rising in New York and flowing S. E. into Newark Bay. It has a fall of 70 feet at Patterson, where the river is 40 yards wide and falls in an unbroken sheet, forming one of the most beautiful cascades in the country.

Passamaquoddy Bay, an inlet of the Bay of Fundy between the eastern part of Maine and New Brunswick. It contains the Island of Campobello, Moose, Deer, and several others, and receives the waters of many rivers. The tides in the bay rise more than 30 feet; the waters abound with herring, cod, mackerel and pollock, the taking of which afford occupation to great numbers of people. The bay is 12 m. long and 6 wide: it is navigable for the largest ships.

Passamaquoddy Indians. See Perry.

Passao, Cape, a cape of S. America, in Quito. Long. 80. 50. W., lat. 0. 30. S.

Passaro, Cape, anciently called Pachimum, the most southerly point of Sicily. It has a fort to protect the country from the incursions of the Barbary corsairs. Off this cape, Sir George Byng defeated a Spanish squadron in 1735. Long. 15. 22. E., lat. 36. 35. N.

Passarowitz, a town of Servia, where a peace was concluded in 1718 between Charles VI. and Achmet III. It is situate near the river Moravia, 33 m. E. S. E. of Belgrade.

Passaruan, a town of the Island of Java, capital of an extensive principality, with a trade in cotton and rice, 30 m. W. of Panaruan.

Passau, a fortified city of Bavaria, capital of the circle of Lower Danube, and formerly of a principality of its name, which in 1815 was divided between Bavaria and Austria. It stands on the Danube, where it receives the Inn and Ilz, and by these rivers is divided into four parts; namely, the town of Passau, Insadt, Ilstadt, and the fortified castle of Oberhaus, on the mountain of St. George. This city is celebrated for the treaty, or religious peace, concluded here in 1552. In 1662 the cathedral and greatest part of the town were consumed by fire, but they have been handsomely rebuilt. It is 65 m. E. S. E. of Ratisbon and 135 W. by N. of Vienna. Long. 13. 32. E., lat. 48. 34. N.

Passenheim, a town of Prussia, in the government of Königsberg, 73 m. S. of Königsberg.

Passignano, a town of Italy, in the papal states, 17 m. N. W. of Perugia.

Passy, a village of France, department of Paris, near the town of St. Denis. Here is a manufacture of considerable extent for speedily bleaching cotton and linen cloth.

Passyunk, a township of Philadelphia Co. Pa. adjoining the city.

Pasto, or St. Juan de Pasto, a town of New Granada, capital of a district of its name, seated in a valley, 120 m. N. by E. of Quito. Long. 76. 55. W., lat. 1. 50. N.

Pastrana, a town of Spain, in New Castile, 32 m. E. of Madrid.

Patagonia, a country in the most southern part of S. America, bounded on the N. by Buenos Ayres, and extending 1,100 m. on the eastern coast, from Rio de la Plata to the straits of Magellan. This country has no timber in the S. parts, though the N. contains an immense quantity, and numerous flocks of cattle. The E. coast is generally low. The natives are tall, stout, and well made, some of them six feet five inches in height; but their hands and feet are remarkably small. Their colour is a kind of bronze. They have no other clothing than skins, which they wear with the hair inward, and a little apron of leather. Here is found the tougon or American ostrich, the largest bird of the western continent, being generally 6 feet high. The Patagonians hunt them on horseback and kill them with clubs. The principal harbour is that of Port St. Julian.

Patmos, or Patinos, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, lying 26 m. S. of the Isle of Samos, famous for being the place where St. John wrote the Apocalypse. It is 25 m. in circumference, but produces very little, only a few valleys being capable of cultivation; partridges, rabbits, quails, turtles, pigeons, and snipes abound. In the midst of the island rises a mountain, terminated by the convent of St. John, the abbot of which is the prince of the country. The hermitage of the Apocalypse is situate on the side of the mountain between the convent and the port of Scala. It leads to the church of the Apocalypse, which is built against a grotto in a rock, pointed out as the asylum of St. John, during his exile. The inhabitants are chiefly sailors or ship-builders; and have some trade in cotton, and stockings of their manufacture. Long. 26. 24. E., lat. 37. 24. N.

Patna, a city of Hindoostan, capital of Behar, seated on the right bank of the Ganges, opposite the influx of the Gunduck, and fortified with a wall and citadel. In the citadel were confined the British prisoners taken in 1764, by Meer Cossim, nabob of Bengal, by whose order they were brutally massacred. This occasioned the storming of the city since which period it has acknowledged the British sway, and is the residence of the provincial courts, &c. The buildings are high but the streets are narrow. It is a place of considerable trade. 320 m. N. W. of Calcutta. Long. 85. 10. E., lat. 24. 35. N.

Pegu, a province of Birmah, bounded N. by Arracan and Ava, W. and S. by the bay of Bengal, and E. by Siam. It is very fruitful in corn, roots, pulse, and fruits: its other products are teak timber, elephants' teeth, beeswax, lac, saltpetre, iron, lead, tin, petroleum, very fine rubies, small diamonds, and plenty of lead. The inhabitants are generally of low stature and have small eyes. The women are much finer than the men, small, but well proportioned. In the low flat part of the country, which is liable to be overflowed, the houses are built upon stakes, and in time of inundation the inhabitants communicate with each other by boats. Pegu was long an independent kingdom, and, in 1752, conquered the kingdom of Birmah; but Alompra, whom the king of Pegu had continued as chief at Monchabou, soon afterwards revolted, and in 1757 reduced Pegu to a dependent province.

Pegu, a city of the above province, erected on the site of the former city which was ruined by Alompra in 1757. The ancient city was a quadrangle, each side measuring nearly a mile and a half, and surrounded by strong walls and other fortifications, now in ruins. The magnificent temple of Shoemadoo still exists as a monument of its ancient greatness. The present city occupies about one-fourth of the former area. On the N. and E. sides it borders on the old wall, and is fenced round by a stockade. It is seated on a river of the same name, 300 m. S. of Ummersapoora. Long. 96. 11. E., lat. 17. 40. N.

Pei-ho, or White-river, a river of China, in Pe-tche-li, which passes near Pekin, and by the cities of Tong-tchou and Tiensing, into the Yellow Sea. The tide flows 110 m., and frequently submerges the flat country on its banks.

Peina, a town of Hanover, in the principality of Hildesheim, with a palace and a Capuchin convent. 20 m. E. of Hanover.

Peipus, or Tchudskoi, a large lake of Russia, between the governments of Petersburg and Livonia. The river Neirova issues from this lake, by which it has a communication at Narva with the gulf of Finland.

Peishora, or Peshawar, a town of Afghanistan, capital of a fine and populous district of its name.

The inhabitants are estimated at 100,000. How the Hon. M. S. Elphinstone had his audience with the Afghan king in 1809. 96 m. S. S. E. of Cabul. Long. 70. 37. E., lat. 33. 32. N.

Peiskretscham, a town of Prussian Silesia, in the government of Oppeln, 39 m. S. E. of Oppeln.

Peitz, a town of Prussia, in the Ucker mark of Brandenburg, with manufactures of cloth and yarn; and in the neighbourhood are iron-works. It stands on the Mankse, which runs into the Spree, 10 m. N. N. E. of Cobus and 37 S. S. E. of Frankfurt.

Pekin, the capital of the empire of China, in the province of Pe-tche-li. Its name signifies the Northern Court, to distinguish it from Nan-king, the Southern Court, where the emperor formerly resided. This capital forms an oblong square, and is divided into two cities; one inhabited by Chinese, the other by Tartars. Those two cities, exclusive of the suburbs, are nearly 14 miles in circumference. The walls of the city are 26 feet high, 24 thick at the base, and 12 at the top; and there are spacious towers at 70 feet distance from each other. The gates are high, and well arched, supporting buildings of nine stories high; the lowest of which is for the soldiers when they come off guard: they are nine in number, three in the S. wall, and two in each of the other sides. The middle gate, on the E. side, opens into the Tartar or imperial city, which is a space within the general enclosure, about a mile from N. to S. and three-fourths of a mile from E. to W., with a rivulet winding through it. A wall of large red polished bricks, 20 feet high, covered with a roof of tiles painted yellow and varnished, surrounds this space, in which are contained the imperial palace and gardens, the public offices, and lodgings for the ministers, the eunuchs, artificers, and tradesmen belonging to the court. Between the other two gates in the S. wall, and the opposite ones on the N. side of the city, run two straight streets, each 4 m. in length and 120 feet wide. One street of the same width runs from one of the eastern to the corresponding western gate, but the other is interrupted by the imperial city, round the walls of which it is carried. The other streets branch from these main streets at right angles, and are very narrow. The houses have no windows nor openings to the street, except the great shops; most of them are poorly built, and have only a ground floor. It is astonishing to see the concourse of people in the main streets, yet not one Chinese woman among them, and the confusion occasioned by the number of horses, camels, mules, asses, waggons, carts, and chairs; without reckoning the several mobs which gather about the jugglers, ballad-singers, &c. Persons of distinction have always a horseman to go before them and clear the way. All the great streets are guarded by soldiers, who patrol night and day with swords by their sides, and whips in their hands, to chastise those who make any disturbance, or take them into custody. The minor streets have lattice gates at their entrance into the great streets, which are shut up at night, and guarded by soldiers, who suffer no assemblies in the streets at that time. The emperor's palace and garden, which occupy two-thirds of the Tartar city, is surrounded by a brick wall, 2 m. in length, with pavilions at each corner encompassed by galleries, supported by columns; the architecture of the stupendous pile of buildings of which the palace consists is entirely different from that of the Europeans. The temples and the towers of Pekin are so numerous that it is difficult to count them. The surrounding country is sandy and unproductive, but provisions of all kinds are exceedingly plentiful, being brought, as well as the merchandise, from all parts by canals from the rivers, which are always crowded with vessels of different sizes. An earthquake which happened here, in 1731, buried above 100,000 persons in the ruins of the houses. The inhabitants are estimated at 2,000,000. It is 60 m. S. of the great wall. Long. 116. 27. E., lat. 39. 54. N.

Pelagisi, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, about 8 m. in circumference. Long. 24. 12. E., lat. 39. 30. N.

Pelagrino, a mountain on the N. coast of Sicily, nearly 2 m. W. of Palermo. On this mount is a cavern, in which is the image of St. Rosolio, the patroness of Palermo, who is said to have died here: and round this cave a church is built, where priests attend to watch the precious relics, and receive the offerings of the pilgrims.

Pelew Islands, or Paldos, a group of islands in the Pacific Ocean, lying between 133. and 136. E. long. and 6. and 8. N. lat. They are encircled on the W. side by a reef of coral; and are 18 in number, of which the principal ones are Orooloon, Emung, Emillegue, Artinal, Corooraa, and Pelelew. They are well covered with trees of various kinds and sizes; and every part of that called Corooraa bears the marks of industry and good cultivation. Captain Wilson, of the Antelope E. India packet, who was wrecked here in 1783, found the natives simple in their manners, delicate in their sentiments, and friendly in their disposition. The astonishment which they manifested on seeing the English, plainly showed that they had never before seen a white man. They had no idea of the nature of powder and shot, and were exceedingly amazed on seeing its effects. Their principal arms consist of bamboo darts, from 5 to 8 feet long, pointed with the wood of the betel-nut tree; but there are short ones for different marks, which are thrown by means of a stick two feet long. The chiefs wear a bone round one of their wrists, in the form of a bracelet, which, being a mark of great honour conferred by the king, is never to be parted with but with life. They are not all of the same degree, as appeared from a difference in the bone they wore. Captain Wilson was invested with the highest order of the bone. With respect to property, in these islands, a man's house or canoe is considered as his own, as is also the land allotted to him, as long as he occupies and cultivates it; but, whenever he removes to another place, the ground reverts to the king. The natives make canoes out of the bark of trees, some large enough to carry 30 men. Yams and cocoa nuts, being their chief articles of subsistence, are attended with the utmost care; and the milk of the latter is their common drink. On particular occasions, they add to their ordinary fare certain sweetmeats, and a sweet beverage, obtained by the aid of a syrup, extracted either from the palm-tree or the sugarcane. Their houses are raised about three feet from the ground, the foundation beams being laid on large stones, whence spring the upright supports of their sides, which are crossed by other timbers grooved together, and fastened by wooden pins, the intermediate space being closely filled up with bamboos and palm-tree leaves, platted together: the inside is without any divisions, forming one great room. They have little baskets, nicely woven from slips of the plantain-tree, and wooden baskets with covers, neatly carved, and inlaid with shells. No one goes abroad without a basket, which usually contains some betel-nut, a comb, a knife, and a little twine. The best knives are made of a piece of the large mother-of-pearl oyster, ground narrow, and the outward side a little polished. The combs are made of the orange-tree, of which there are a few of the Seville kind; the handle and teeth are fastened to the solid wood. The fishing hooks are of tortoise shell; and twine, cord, and fishing-nets, are well manufactured from the husks of the cocoa-nut. Of the plantain leaf are formed mats, which serve the people as beds. They also use a plantain leaf at meals, instead of a plate; and the shell of a cocoa-nut supplies the place of a cup. There are vessels of a kind of earthen ware, of a reddish brown colour, in which they boil their fish, yams, &c. A bundle of cocoa-nut husks serves them for a broom; and thick bamboos, with bores five or six inches in diameter, are the buckets or cisterns. The shell of the tortoise is here remarkably beautiful, and the natives have discovered the art of moulding it into little trays or dishes and spoons. Some of the great ladies have also bracelets of the same manufacture, and ear-rings inlaid with shells. The Pelewans, in general, are stout and well made, rather above the middle stature, and of a deep copper colour. Their hair is long, and generally formed into one large loose curl round their heads. The men are entirely naked: but the women wear two little aprons, one before, the other behind. Both sexes are tattooed, have their teeth made black by art, and the cartilage between the nostrils bored, through which they frequently put a sprig or blossom of some plant or shrub. The men have the left ear bored, and the women both; a few of the former wear beads in the perforated ear, the latter either the leaf, or an ear-ring of inlaid tortoise-shell. Both sexes are very expert swimmers; and the men are admirable divers. Such an opinion had Abba Thulle, the king of the island, entertained of the English that on their departure, he permitted his second son, Lee Boo, to accompany them to England, where he arrived in 1784. In a few months after, this hopeful youth died of the small-pox, and the E. India Company erected a monument over his grave in Rotherhithe church-yard.

Pembroke, a borough of Wales, capital of Pembrokehire. It stands on the innermost creek of Milford-haven, over which are two bridges, but the harbour is become injured by the rubbish of the neighbouring lime-stone quarries. It was anciently surrounded by walls, and had a magnificent castle, the remains of which still give it an appearance of uncommon grandeur. 283 m. W. by N. of London. Long. 4. 48. W., lat. 51. 43. N.

Pembrokehire, a county of Wales, 37 m. long and 28 broad; surrounded on all sides by the sea, except on the E., where it is bounded by Caermarthenshire, and Cardiganshire. It contains 335,600 acres, is divided into 7 hundreds and 145 parishes, has one city and 7 market towns, and sends three members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 74,009. The rivers are inconsiderable. A great part of the county is plain and tolerably fertile, consisting of rich meadows and arable land. The N. E. part alone is mountainous, which, however yield good pasturage for sheep and cattle. This county abounds with objects of antiquarian interest, such as druidical circles, cromlechs, single stone monuments, castles, &c.

Pennsylvania, one of the United States, bounded N. by Lake Erie and New York, E. by New York and New Jersey, S. by Delaware, Maryland and Virginia, and W. by Virginia and Ohio. It extends from 39. 42. to 42. N. lat. and from 74. to 80. 40. W. long. and contains 43,950 sq. m. The centre of the state is occupied by the great Appalachian chain of mountains, which here spread out to their greatest width, and occupy two thirds of the whole territory. The Delaware bounds the state on the East. The Susquehanna with its numerous branches intersect nearly the whole mountainous region. The Allegany, Monongahela and Ohio, water the western parts. A small portion of the northern limit is washed by Lake Erie.

In the country E. of the mountains, the climate does not differ greatly from that part of New Jersey in the same parallel, and may be characterized in general terms as mild and temperate. The mountainous country lies exposed to the chilling north-west winds, and the winter in this part is severe, with deep snows. W. of the mountains, the climate becomes milder; here the easterly winds of the Atlantic coast are unknown, and the country is not exposed to the sudden changes which they occasion. The heat of the summer is not so great as upon the coast, and the autumn is long, serene and temperate.

East of the mountains the soil is excellent; in this part the land is level, and enriched from the washing of the hills and uplands. In the interior, the soil is rocky and barren, with fertile spots in the valleys, and along the borders of the streams. Some of these valleys contain land as rich as any in the state; but generally the soil being a black mould, two or three feet deep, and among the mountains, is not well adapted to cultivation. W. of the mountains, the country improves, and around the head streams of the Ohio, is generally fertile

The most important mineral is an anthracite coal, in which this state far surpasses all other portions of the country. In no part of the world, indeed, is this valuable material found so abundantly as in Pennsylvania. It abounds in the Wyoming and Lackawanna valley, between the Blue Ridge and the Susquehanna. The anthracite district is principally occupied by mountains running parallel to the Blue Ridge, often broad, with table summits, and rising generally about 1,500 feet above the ocean.

The coal occurs in the greatest quantity in those parts of this region most accessible by water. Extensive veins and beds range from the Lehigh to the Susquehanna, crossing the head waters of Schuylkill and Swatara, about 10 m. N. W. of the Blue Ridge. It is abundant near the Susquehanna, and Lackawanna, but in no part is it so plentiful as at Mauch Chunk, a village on the Lehigh, a branch of the Susquehanna.

The anthracite region of the Susquehanna lies in the valley formed by the Susquehanna and the Lackawanna, one of its branches; this region is distinguished as the valleys of the Wyoming and Lackawanna, but is in fact without any natural division, and constitutes a single formation. It is between 60 and 70 m. long, and 5 broad.

The coal lies in beds, and not as commonly, in veins; these are of every thickness, from a foot to 27 feet; none are much esteemed that are less than three or four; few are wrought that are less than 6. The lateral extent of the beds is immense; they break out in the precipices and hills, and upon the banks of the Susquehanna and Lackawanna, and form in some places the pavement of these rivers; they appear in the sides and channels of almost every stream from the mountain; they blacken the soil in numerous places; and wells are often sunk in the coal. In many of the mines of this region, the naturalist is gratified by seeing vast deposits of vegetable impressions and remains which accompany the coal, usually in the slate which forms the roof, and occasionally in that of the floor; they exist also in the sandstone, and sometimes even in the coal itself. There are instances where they fill the slate for a space of ten feet in thickness. The impressions are very perfect, indicating repose and calm at the time of their deposition, and excluding the possibility of transport from distant countries.

There are many species of ferns, none of them, it is said, modern, and most or all, tropical. There are impressions sometimes several feet long and of the same width, of the bark of gigantic vegetables; some botanists say they are palms; occasionally there are entire limbs carbonized, and there are frequently broad leaves 6 or 7 inches in diameter. Culmiferous plants are numerous, and also the aquatic algae and rushes; the leaves of the plants are usually in full expansion, the most delicate parts of their structure being accurately preserved or copied. Large quantities of clay and iron and bog ore are connected with the coal strata of this valley, and chalybeate mineral springs occur in numerous places.

The western part of Pennsylvania is as abundantly supplied with bituminous coal as the eastern is with anthracite. It is found on the rivers Conemaugh, Alleghany, Monongahela and Ohio, and in numerous places W. of the Alleghany ridge, which is, with some exceptions, its eastern boundary. It occurs upon these mountains at a considerable elevation, and elsewhere, in nearly a horizontal position, alternating with grey sand stone, often micaceous, and bordered by argillaceous schist. The veins are generally narrow, rarely above 6 feet in width. The coal is abundant, and of excellent quality near Pittsburgh.

Springs holding salt in solution, are common in various parts of the bituminous coal region; they are generally weak near the surface, but deep springs, disclosed by boring, are often strong. One of these, which contains as much salt as the ordinary waters of Salina, was discovered by boring, about 20 m. from Montrose, bordering on the state of New York. The most considerable saline springs are on the banks of the Conemaugh and Kiskaminitas, about 30 m. E. of Pittsburgh. These rivers for many miles wind rapidly through rocky ravines bordered by hills of 300 and 400 feet in height, that rise with steep acclivities, presenting mural precipices of grey sandstone, in places jutting over the road and torrent. The sandstone is ordinarily fine, but is sometimes a coarse aggregate, principally quartz. Its thin laminae are generally in a horizontal position. The lower strata, often in a decomposing state, contains vegetable impressions. This rock usually rests on dark and very fissile argillaceous schist, that contains much sulphuret of iron, and forms the roof and floor of numerous beds of bituminous coal adjacent to the streams. These beds are from a few inches to 5 feet in thickness, and occur at various altitudes, from 200 feet above the river to a great depth below. Large quantities of salt are made at these springs. Iron ore is found in abundance in the extensive calcareous valley, between the ridges of the Appalachian mountains, particularly in the counties of Centre and Huntingdon. It is mostly raised from beds of argillaceous earth, resting on limestone. The iron manufactured in the counties before mentioned is distinguished for its tenacity and malleability. Bituminous coal from the Alleghany mountain is often used for making pig iron.

The Bedford Springs near the town of that name among the mountains in the S. of the state, were discovered in 1804. They arise from a limestone rock, at the foot of a mountain. The water is cold, odourless, soft and agreeable to the taste; it is charged with iron, magnesia and lime, and is efficacious in removing cutaneous and chronic complaints. There are several salt springs in the state. Wild animals are abundant among the mountains and in all the unsettled parts. The most remarkable of these is the cougar, or catamount, sometimes called panther

This animal is common to both parts of the western continent but is not known in the eastern.

Copper ore, in a variety of combinations, is found in many places among the mountains. There is a lead mine at Perkiomen. At Mercer, on the western border of the state, is a manufactory of coppers from iron pyrites.

The limestone of this state affords good marble. On the Schuylkill, in Montgomery county, is a quarry of bluish marble, which is extensively wrought, and exported. Many of the buildings in Philadelphia are ornamented with it. There are quarries of slate in York, Lancaster and Wayne counties, in the eastern part of the state.

The state is divided into two districts, the eastern and western. The counties are 51, the townships 651. The pop. is 1,347,672. Harrisburg is the seat of government, and Philadelphia the largest city. The other large towns are Pittsburg, Reading, and Lancaster. Agriculture is skillfully conducted in the eastern parts. Wheat, maize, garden vegetables and fruit are raised in great quantities. In the interior and western parts the farmers also cultivate buckwheat, rye, oats, barley, hemp and flax. The commerce of the state is chiefly confined to the single port of Philadelphia. The port of Presque Isle, on Lake Erie has also some commerce, and the internal trade across the mountains is very active. The shipping of the state in 1828 was 104,614 tons. The imports during the same year were 10,100,152 dollars. The exports of domestic produce 2,617,152 dollars. Total exports 4,069,435 dollars. The manufactures of Pennsylvania are very extensive. At Philadelphia are large manufactures of cotton, iron, glass and china ware, besides the great variety of articles made in small establishments. The cloth annually manufactured is estimated at 24,000,000 yards. At Pittsburg and in the neighborhood, are very large establishments of various kinds. The glass manufactures of this place are particularly celebrated, and furnish cut glass ware, and window glass, equal to any in the country. The glass is white, clear and excellent, both in texture and polish. The cotton manufacture is also extensive, and occupies several large establishments here and in the neighbouring towns of Alleghany and Birmingham. The manufactures of iron employ 9 founderies, 8 rolling mills and 9 nail factories, which make 18 tons of nails daily. There are also 7 manufactories of steam engines, and lately the manufacture of sugar mills, and small steam machinery to drive them, has become an important branch of business. There are two establishments in Pittsburg for the manufacture of steel. There are great numbers of iron works in various parts of the state. At York, is a foundery for church bells, manufactures of cutlery, surgical instruments, &c. Elegant carpeting is also made at the same place. At Mayanunk, on the Schuylkill, are large cotton and woolen manufactories. At Chambersburg, besides other establishments, are extensive manufactories of edge tools, axes, carpenters' tools, hatchets, chisels, &c. of a quality and temper equal to any made in England. At Bush Hill, near Philadelphia, is a manufacture of elegant floor cloths, from hemp and flax, and of table cloths from cotton. At Bethany, in Wayne county, is a glass manufactory, which produces 450,000 feet of window glass annually. At Meadville is a manufactory of paper from straw, which is extensively used for wrapping paper. This is the first successful attempt to make paper from straw.

In the western part are large manufactories of salt from springs. The principal salt works are on the Conemaugh, a stream running into the Alleghany. The salt manufactured at Kiskaminitas and Conemaugh has in some years amounted to 300,000 bushels; it is sold at from 20 to 25 cents per bushel at the works; the expense of manufacturing does not exceed 10 cents a bushel.

A large portion of the numerous salt works are near the river in the ravines of the Kiskaminitas, and coal for fuel is procured from veins situated above the works, in the side of the hill, and costs but a cent a bushel. Considerable salt is made near Pittsburg, from a fountain obtained by boring 270 feet; the water is strong, and is raised by a steam engine; the salt is white, and of a good quality. This fountain is sufficient for the annual manufacture of 25,000 bushels. There are other salt springs on the Ohio, and also on the Chenango and Mahony.

The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The senators are chosen for four years, and the representatives annually. Suffrage is universal. The governor is chosen for three years by a popular vote. There is no Lt. governor and no council. The governor can only be elected thrice in 12 years and on retiring from office becomes a senator. The legislature meets annually at Harrisburg in December. The state sends 24 representatives to Congress. The state expenses for 1830, were 6,357,994 dollars, of which enormous sum 5,496,550 dollars were for canals, railroads and other internal improvements.

The Presbyterians are the most numerous religious sect, and are divided into two classes; one of which call themselves Associate Presbyterians. These two have 266 preachers. The Baptists have 144; the Methodists 140; the German Reformed Church 73; the Episcopalians 60; there are also Lutherans, Unitarians, Catholics, Quakers, Dutch Reformed, Universalists and Jews.

The navigation of the Schuylkill has been improved by a series of canals from Philadelphia to Port Carbon in the coal region, a distance of 100 miles: 64 m. of which consist of canals, and the remainder of portions of the river, rendered navigable by dams and slack water. The canals are 36 feet wide, and were finished in 1825. The Union canal extends from Reading on the Schuylkill to Middletown on the Susquehanna, 83 miles; it is 36 feet wide and four deep. There is a tunnel on this canal 729 feet long, 18 feet wide and 16 high, being the longest in the United States. This canal was completed in 1828. A branch extends up the Swatara to the Schuylkill coal mines. The Conestoga creek is rendered navigable by canals, 18 m. from Lancaster to the Susquehanna. The Lehigh canal extends from Easton to Mauch Chunk 46 3-4 m.; it is 4 feet wide and 4 deep, and is esteemed the most perfect canal in America; it was executed in 2 years, and cost 25,000 dollars a mile. The Lackawaxen canal extends from the Delaware and Hudson canal 25 m. up the Lackawaxen creek to the coal mines, and is navigable for boats of 25 tons.

The Pennsylvania canal is a work undertaken by the state, and designed to form a communication between Philadelphia and Pittsburg. A railroad is to be constructed from Philadelphia to Columbia 80 m. Here the canal begins and extends to the Union canal at Middletown, thence W. to the Juniata, and up that river to the mountains, which are to be crossed by a railroad or tunnel; beyond this the canal is to be continued to Pittsburg. The whole length of this communication will be 394 m.

The other canals now constructing by the state government are one from Middletown on the Union canal to Muncey Hills on the W. branch of the Susquehanna, 90 m. Another from Northumberland on the Susquehanna up the E. branch to Nanticoke falls, 55 m. Another from Bristol up the Delaware to Easton on the Lehigh, 60 m. This is called the Delaware canal. Another from Meadville on French creek, a head water of the Alleghany, to Muddy River in the N. W. of the state, 20 m. The whole length of the canals in the state will be 728 m.

The Mauch Chunk railroad extends from the coal mine, to the river Lehigh, 9 m.; it was completed four years since. The Mill Creek railway extends 3 m. from Port Carbon up Mill Creek to the coal mines. The Lackawaxen railroad extends 16 m., from the Lackawaxen canal at Honesdale, to the coal mines at Carbondale, on the Lackawanna, passing through Rix's Gap, in the Moosic Mountain. An ascent and descent of 1,812 feet is passed by 8 inclined planes, at 5 of which on the western side of the mountain are stationary engines. This railroad cost about 12,000 dollars a mile, and went into operation in 1829. Besides these, there are now in progress the following; Pennsylvania Railroad, from Philadelphia through Lancaster to Columbia, on the Susquehanna, 84 m.; Schuylkill West Branch Railroad, from Schuylkill Haven to the coal mines on Broad Mountain, 13 m. long, including a branch of 2 1-2 m.; Schuylkill Valley Railroad, from Port Carbon, eastward up the valley of the Schuylkill, nearly to its head, 10 m. long, passing through a district richly supplied with coal; this last is nearly completed. The Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroad is to extend from Baltimore to York Haven, on the Susquehanna, 60 m.

This state has a university at Philadelphia and colleges at Carlisle, Canonsburg, Pittsburg, Meadville, Alleghany, Uniontown and Washington. Common education however is in a backward state. About one third of all the children in the State attend school. The sum of 2,000,000 dollars was bequeathed by the late Stephen Girard to found a school in Philadelphia.

Pennsylvania has its name from William Penn, a quaker who began a settlement in the state in 1681. He made a treaty with the Indians which was observed on both sides with such scrupulous honour that not the least discord arose between the settlers and the savages for 70 years. The original charter of their state continued till after the revolution. The present constitution was established in 1790.

Pennsant, one of the highest mountains of England, in Yorkshire, 7 m. N. of Settle. Its summit is 3,930 feet above the level of the sea. On its sides are two awful orifices, called Hulpit and Huntpit holes; through each of them runs a brook, both of which run under ground for about a mile, and cross each other in the bowels of the earth without mixing their waters.

Pennystown, a village of Hunterdon Co. N. Y. 10 m. N. W. Trenton.

Penco, a town of Pike Co. Missouri.

Penobscot, a river of Maine and the largest in the state. It has two large head streams, the chief of which runs W. of Moosehead lake in the highland which separate Maine from Canada. It flows S. and on joining the ocean forms a wide bay to which it gives its name. It is navigable to Bangor, 50 m.

Penobscot, a county of Maine on the above river. Pop. 31,530. Bangor is the capital. Also a town on the river 30 m. below Bangor. Pop. 1,271.

Penobscot Indians. See Indian Old Town.

Penrice, a town of Wales, in Glamorganshire. Here are the ruins of a Norman castle; and 3 m. to the N., on a mountain, is a Druidical monument, called Arthur's stone. Penrice is seated on the Bristol Channel, 20 m. S. E. of Caermarthen and 220 W. of London.

Penrith, a town in Cumberland, Eng., in the church-yard is a singular monument of antiquity, called the Giant's Grave. The ruins of the ancient castle overlook the town from the W., and on the heights to the N. is a square stone building called the "Beacon," well situated for giving alarm in times of danger. The ascent to it is difficult, but the prospects from the summit of the hill are extensive and beautiful. 263 m. N. N. W. of London.

Penryn, a borough in Cornwall, Eng. Here are large warehouses for flour and grain imported from the Isle of Wight, and several good breweries, which supply the shipping at Falmouth; and it has a great trade in the pilchard and Newfoundland fisheries. It is seated on a creek of Falmouth Haven, 3 m. N. W. of Falmouth and 263 W. by S. of London.

Pensacola, p.t. Escambia Co. W. Florida, on the Gulf of Mexico. It is the largest town in West Florida, and has a capacious harbour, but the town can be approached only by small vessels. It is a naval station of the United States. The situation is comparatively healthy, and the town is somewhat thriving. The town was founded at an early period by the Spaniards. It is 50 m. E. S. E. Mobile. 900 m. S. W. Washington. Lat. 30. 25. N., long. 87. W. Pop. about 2,000.

Pensford, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. with a manufacture of hats; seated on the Chew, 6 m. S. by E. of Bristol and 117 W. by S. of London.

Pentland Frith, a strait which divides the Orkney Islands from Caithness-shire, in Scotland. It is 20 m. long and 10 broad, and dangerous to those who are not acquainted with its tides and currents; especially in passing the Pentland Skerries, a cluster of rocks at the E. end of the frith. On the largest of these rocks is a lighthouse. Long. 2. 42. W., lat. 58. 35. N.

Pentland Hills, a ridge of hills, in Scotland, 4 m. W. of Edinburgh.

Penza, a government of Russia, formerly a province of Kasan. Its capital, of the same name, is seated on the Sura, where it receives the rivulet Penza, 220 m. S. W. of Kasan. Long. 45. 38 E., lat 53 30 N

Penzance, a sea-port in Cornwall, Eng. It was burnt by the Spaniards in 1593, but soon rebuilt, and made one of the tin-coinage towns. Its trade is considerable, and consists chiefly in pilchards and other fish, and in shipping lead, tin, and copper, which abound in the vicinity. In consequence of the mildness and salubrity of the air, and the agreeableness of its situation, Penzance is much frequented by invalids, for whose accommodation there are cold and hot sea-water baths, &c. It is seated on a creek of Mount Bay, 10 m. N. E. of the Land's End and 280 W. by S. of London.

Peoria Lake, in Illinois, an expansion of the river Illinois, 20 m. in length and 2 in breadth. It is very deep and has no perceptible current. Here is a settlement called Peoria, on its banks.

Pepperell, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 40 m. N. W. Boston. Pop. 1,440.

Pequigny, a town of France, department of Somme; memorable for an interview and treaty between Louis XI. of France and Edward IV. of England, in 1475, on a bridge built for that purpose. It is seated on the river Somme, 15 m. S. E. of Abbeville.

Perak, a sea-port of Malaya, capital of a kingdom on the W. coast. It is seated on a river of the same name, 180 m. N. W. of Malacca. Long. 100. 0. E., lat. 4. 23. N.

Peray, St., a town of France, department of Ardeche, noted for its wines. It is seated on the Rhone opposite Valence, 32 m. N. of Viviers.

Perrido, a river separating Florida from Alabama and flowing into the Gulf of Mexico.

Perdu Mount, a lofty mountain of the Pyrenees, with a double summit, of which the higher is computed at 11,000 feet above the sea. It is of very difficult access, as the calcareous rock often assumes the form of perpendicular walls, from 100 to 600 feet in height; and glaciers increase the difficulty. About 2,000 feet from the summit is a lake, which throws its waters to the E., into the Spanish valley of Beoussa.

Perga, a town of Albania, on the gulf of Venice, 25 m. W. N. W. of Arta.

Pergamar, a town of Romania, and a bishop's see, 60 m. S. W. of Adrianople. Long. 25. 55. E., lat. 41. 10. N.

Pergamo, a town of Natolia, and a bishop's see, with a palace and a castle. It is not so considerable as formerly, but has nine mosques, and occupies an oblong circumference of 3 m. at the foot of a mountain. Here parchment was invented. It is seated on the Germasti, 15 m. from its mouth and 37 N. of Smyrna. Long. 27. 27. E., lat. 39. 5. N.

Peria, a town of Persia, in the province of Irac, 90 m. W. of Ispahan. Long. 51. 25. E., lat. 32. 20. N.

Periac, a town of France, department of Aude, celebrated for its salt works. It is seated on a lake of its name, 6 m. S. W. of Narbonne.

Periapatam, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore. The environs are rich and beautiful, and abound in sandal wood. It is 40 m. W. by S. of Seringapatam.

Periers, a town of France, department of Manche, 9 m. N. of Coutances.

Perigord, a former province of France, now forming the department of Dordogne.

Perigueux, a town of France. capital of the department of Dordogne, and a bishop's see. Here are the ruins of a temple of Venus, an amphitheatre, &c. It is seated on the river Ille, 50 m. S. W. of Limoges. Long. 0. 43. E., lat. 45. 11. N.

Perinda, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of its name, in the province of Dowlatabad, 188 m. N. W. of Hyderabad. Long. 75. 50. E., lat. 18. 33. N.

Perindura, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Coimbatore, 12 m. S. S. W. of Bhawankudal.

Perleberg, a town of Prussia, in Brandenburg with considerable cloth manufactures. It is seated on the Stepenitz, 42 m. W. N. W. of Ruppinn. Long. 12. 3. E., lat. 53. 8. N.

Perkinsonville, a village of Amelia Co. Va.

Perkiomen, a township of Montgomery Co. Pa. on a river of the same name, 25 m. N. Philadel.

Perm, a government of Russia, formerly a province of Kasan. It is divided into two provinces, Perm and Catharinenburg, the capitals of which are of the same name.

Perm, a town Russia, capital of a government and province of the same name. It is seated on the Kama, at the influx of the Zegochekha, 620 m. E. by N. of Moscow and 810 E. by S. of Petersburg. Long. 55. 10. E., lat. 57. 55. N.

Permacoil, a town of Hindoostan, in the Carnatic, situate on a mountain, 20 m. N. N. W. of Pondicherry.

Pernalla, a town of Hindoostan, in Guzerat, 38 m. S. of Surat.

Pernambuco, or Fernambuco, a province of Brazil, bounded N. and E. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. by Bahia, and E. by the desert territory. It is about 470 m. from N. to S. and 370 from E. to W. and abounds in sugar-cane, cotton, and Brazil wood.

Pernambuco, the capital of the above province, consists of three divisions, Recife, St. Antonio, and Boa Vista. The two former are situated on two flat sand banks, surrounded by the sea, and connected together by a bridge, partly of stone and partly of wood; the other division is connected, with Boa Vista, situated on the continent, by a narrow wooden bridge. The greatest part of the extent of sand between Olinda, a town about a league distant, on the same sand bank as Recife, and the latter, remains uncovered, is open to the sea, and the surf there is very violent. The tide enters between the bridges, and encircles the middle compartment. The first division of the town is composed of brick houses, of three, four, and even five stories in height: most of the streets are narrow and there are no public buildings that require notice. St. Antonio, the principal division of the town, is composed chiefly of large houses and broad streets. It contains the governor's palace (formerly the Jesuits' convent), the treasury, the town hall and prison, the barracks, and the Franciscan, Carmelite, and Penha convents. It comprises several squares, and has to a certain degree a gay and lively appearance. The river Capibaribe discharges its waters into the channel between St. Antonio and Boa Vista. The harbour belonging to Recife, called the Mosqueiro, situated on the outward bank, is formed by a reef of rocks, which runs parallel with the town, at a very small distance. Pernambuco is daily increasing in opulence and importance, and European fashions prevail. Long. 35. 20. W., lat. 8. 13. S.

Pernau, a fortified town of Russia, in Livonia, with a castle; seated near the mouth of a river of the same name, 95 m. N. of Riga. Long. 94. 3. E., lat. 58. 30. N.

Pernes, a town of France, department of Vaucluse, noted as the birthplace of the celebrated orator Flechier, bishop of Nîmes. 12 m. E. by N. of Avignon.

Perno, a town of Sweden, in the province of Nyland, on the coast of the Baltic, 36 m. E. of Helsingfors.

Peronne, a strong town of France, department of Somme. It was called Pucelle, because never taken, though often besieged, till the 26th of June, 1815, when it was stormed by the British. Charles the Simple was imprisoned in the castle, where he miserably died; and the duke of Burgundy detained Louis XI. here three days, till he consented to sign a disadvantageous treaty. It is seated on the Somme, 27 m. S. W. of Cambray and 80 E. by N. of Paris. Long. 3. 2. E., lat. 49. 55. N.

Perouse, a town of the Sardinian states, in Piedmont; seated on the river Cluson, 6 m. N. W. of Fignerol.

Perpignan, a fortified town of France, capital of the department of Eastern Pyrenees, with a good citadel and a university. The inhabitants carry on a trade in corn, wool, iron, and wine, and have manufactures of silk, woollens, soap, liqueurs, &c. This town was the scene of two battles between the French and Spaniards, in 1793. It is seated partly on a gentle declivity and partly in a plain, on the Tet, near the Mediterranean, 96 m. S. E. of Toulouse. Long. 2. 54. E., lat. 42. 42. N.

Persepolis, anciently the capital of the Persian empire. It was taken by Alexander the Great, who set it on fire. Its magnificent ruins are 50 m. N. E. of Shiras.

Pershore, a town in Worcestershire, Eng. Here are two churches, and that of Holy Cross contains several ancient monuments. It is seated on the Avon, 9 m. E. S. E. of Worcester and 102 W. N. W. of London.

Persia, a large kingdom of Asia, consisting of several provinces, which, at different times, have had their particular kings. It is bounded on the N. by the Caspian Sea, and the mountains of Caucasus, W. by the Euphrates and Tigris, S. by the gulfs of Persia and Ormus and the Arabian Sea, and E. by Hindoostan. It is about 1,225 m. in length from E. to W. and 900 in breadth from N. to S., the chief rivers are the Tigris and Amuc. In the N. and E. parts it is mountainous and cold; in the middle and S. E. parts sandy and desert; and in the S. and W. level and fertile, though for several months very hot. The soil produces various sorts of pulse and corn, and cotton in great abundance. In several places naptha, a sort of bitumen, rises out of the ground, and here are numerous mines of gold, silver, iron, turquois stones, and salt; but the first two of these are not worked on account of the scarcity of wood. This country produces all the various sorts of fruits, excellent wine, and a great number of mulberry trees. The citron here grows to great perfection. Likewise dates, pistachio-nuts, and trees which produce manna. Sheep and goats are abundant; as are also camels, buffaloes, and horses. The principal manufactures are silks, silks mixed with cotton or with camels' or goats' hair, brocades, gold tissues, gold velvet, carpets, calicoes, camlets, &c. The Persians are subjected to a despotism similar to that which prevails upon all oriental nations; yet their character is materially different. They are more gay, lively, and active. They are said to be extremely ostentatious, and to surpass all other nations in politeness—if the most profuse and hypocritical flattery may be so called. Their dress is lighter than that of the Turks, and they are lavish in the use of jewels and gold ornaments. The beard is held in high estimation, and every art employed to render it thick and tufted. They are, however, the most learned people of the E.; poetry and the sciences may even be considered as their ruling passion. In the former, their fame is decidedly superior to that of any other oriental nation. The names of Hafiz, Ferdusi, and Sadi, are classic even in Europe. The religion of the country is Mahomedism, of the sect of Ali. In the beginning of the last century, Persia was overrun by the Afghans, who carried fire and sword through its remotest extremities, and reduced its proudest capitals to ashes. The atrocities of the Afghans were avenged, and the independence of Persia vindicated, by Nadir Shah; but, though the victories of this daring chief threw a lustre on his country, after his death the country was almost torn to pieces by civil war, till the fortune of arms gave a decided superiority to Kurreem Khan. His death gave rise to another disputed succession, with civil wars, as furious as before. At length Aga-Mahommed, a eunuch, raised himself to the sovereignty, and not only retained it during his lifetime, but transmitted it to his nephew, the present sovereign, who assumed the title of Futteh Ali Shah. He is represented as an accomplished prince; and his eldest son is said to be highly promising.

Persian Gulf, a sea or inland lake, between Persia and Arabia. The entrance near Ormus is not above 30 m. over; but within it is from 120 to 250 in breadth, and the length from Ormus to the mouth of the Euphrates is 500 m. The southern side is particularly celebrated for its pearl fishery.

Person, a county of N. Carolina, Pop. 10,027. Roxborough is the Capital.

Perth, a burough of Scotland, capital of Perthshire. It has been the residence of the sovereigns of Scotland, and the seat of the parliament and of the supreme courts of justice. Near the town are some saline springs, called Pitcaithly Wells, deemed beneficial in scorbutic cases. Perth is seated on the S. W. side of the Tay, which is navigable for small vessels, but the largest are obliged to unload at Newburg. Over the river is a modern bridge of 10 arches, the most beautiful in Scotland, to the town of Kinnoul. Here are several incorporated trades, some of which have halls. The salmon fishery is a great article of trade; and the manufactures of linen and cotton goods, leather, boots, shoes, and gloves are considerable. 35 m. N. by W. of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 20. W., lat. 56. 24. N.

Perthes, a town of France, department of Seine-et-Marne, 6 m. S. W. of Melun.

Perthes, a town in the department of Upper Marne, 6 m. N. W. of St. Dizier.

Perthshire, a county of Scotland, 76 m. long and 68 broad; bounded W. by Argyshire, N. by the shires of Inverness and Aberdeen, E. by Angus-shire, S. E. by the frith of Tay and the counties of Fife and Kinross, and S. by the frith of Forth and the counties of Clackmannan, Stirling, and Dumbarton. It contains 4,068,640 English acres, is divided into 76 parishes, and the number of inhabitants in 1821 was 139,050. The country exhibits scenes of rugged and striking magnificence, contrasted with the most beautiful ones of cultivation. The Grampian mountains cross it from S. W. to N. E., the highest of which is Benlawers. The country N. W. of this ridge is mountainous, and contains several lakes; but the opposite side, though not free from hills, is more low and fertile. The principal rivers are the Forth and Tay. Perth is the capital.

Pertigi, a town of the island of Sardinia, 19 m. S. E. of Castel Arogonese.

Pertuis, a town of France, department of Vaucluse, near the Durance, 11 m. N. of Aix. 38 S. E. of Avignon.

Peru, an independent state of S. America, the largest of the former Spanish viceroyalties, bounded on the N. by the republic of Colombia, W. by the Pacific Ocean, S. by Chile, and E. by Brazil. It is 750 m. in medium length, from N. to S., and about 500 in breadth. Rain is unknown in the S. parts; but in the N., where the mountains are not so high, it often rains excessively. There are large forests on the sides of the mountains which advance near the sea; but none of the trees are like those in Europe. Peru has been long celebrated for its mines of gold and silver, which are the chief or only source of its riches. Besides the produce of the mines, the commodities exported are sugar, Vienna wood, cotton, Peruvian bark, copper, and cocoa. The fiercest beasts of prey in Peru are the puma and jaguar, inaccurately called lions and tigers by the Europeans; for they possess neither the undaunted courage of the former, nor the ravenous cruelty of the latter. The lama, or American camel, inhabits the cold districts, and the elk, bear, deer, armadillos, monkeys, &c., are numerous. Among the birds, the most remarkable is the condor, which is entitled to pre-eminence over the flying tribe, in bulk, strength and courage. The river Guayaquil abounds with alligators, and the neighbouring country swarms almost as much with snakes and vipers as that round Porto Bello does with toads. When the Spaniards landed in this country, in 1530, they found it governed by sovereigns called Incas, who were revered by their subjects as divinities. and the inhabitants were found to be much more polished than the natives of other parts of America, those of Mexico excepted. These were soon subdued by the Spaniards, under the command of Francisc Pizarro. After the assassination of Pizarro, in 1541, the country continued a prey to civil contentions and insurrections, till about the year 1562, when Tupac Amaru the son of Manco Capac, who had taken refuge in the mountains, was attacked by the viceroy Toledo. The inca surrendered himself, and was led to the scaffold amid the

surrection. After two years of varied success he was, however, surprised and taken prisoner together with his family, who were all executed. Peru now remained in subjection to Spain, and in a comparative state of tranquillity for some time; and in 1809, when juntas were established in La Paz and Quito, Peru, sent out troops which suppressed their rising efforts. In 1817 the Peruvian army was compelled to evacuate Chile; and Chile in return sent an army into Peru, under general San Martin, who in 1821, in conjunction with the fleet under Lord Cochrane succeeded in liberating it from the Spanish yoke. The country has since undergone so many changes that it cannot at present be considered as in a settled state. Lima is the capital. See America.

Perugia, a province of Italy, in the pope's dominions comprehending the ancient province of Perugino. It is 25 m. long and 24 broad; and is bounded W. by Tuscany, S. by Orvieto, E. by Spoleto and Urbino, and N. by Citta di Castello. The soil is fertile in corn and good wine.

Perugia, the capital of the above province, and a bishop's see, with a strong citadel and university. The churches, and many other buildings, public and private, are very handsome. It is seated on a hill, near the Tiber, 85 m. N. of Rome. Long. 12. 20. E., lat. 43. 6. N.

Perugia, a lake of Italy, 8 m. W. of the city of its name. It is almost round, 5 m. in diameter, and in it are three islands.

Peruvian Mountains, a range in the north-eastern part of New York running parallel with Lake Champlain. The highest summit is called Whiteface, and is 3,000 feet above the lake.

Pesaro, a sea-port of the ecclesiastical states, in the delegation of Urbino, and a bishop's see; the cathedral is magnificent, and it has several handsome churches, with exquisite paintings. The environs are remarkable for producing olives and excellent figs. It is seated on an eminence, at the mouth of the Foglia, on the gulf of Venice, 17 m. E. N. E. of Urbino. Long. 13. 2. E., lat. 45. 52. N.

Pescara, a strong town of Naples, in Abruzzo Citra, at the mouth of a river of the same name, on the gulf of Venice, 9 m. N. N. E. of Chieti.

Peschiera, a strong town of Austrian Italy, in the Veronese. It was taken by the French in 1796; and the garrison surrendered to the Austrians in 1799. It is seated on the river Mincio, where it proceeds from the lake Garda, 16 m. W. of Verona.

Pescia, a town of Tuscany, in the province of Florence, celebrated for its fine oil, 25 m. N. E. of Florence.

Pescina, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Ultra, near the Lake Celano, 20 m. S. by E. of Aquila.

Pesenais, a town of France, department of Herault, on the river Herault, 12 m. N. E. of Beziers.

Pest, a town of Hungary, capital of a palatinate of the same name, with a fortress, a royal palace, and a university, the only one in the kingdom. Here are many Greek merchants, who conduct the Levant trade to Germany and the northern nations. It is seated on the E. side of the Danube, opposite Buda, 96 m. E. S. E. of Presburg. Long. 19. 8. E., lat. 47. 30. N.

Pesti, a town of Naples, in Principato Citra, seated near the magnificent ruins of the ancient Pæstum, 20 m. S. E. of Salerno.

Petapa, a town of Mexico, 25 m. S. E. of Guatimala.

Petaguai, a province on the N. coast of Brazil, between the provinces of Seara and Rio Grande. It contains mines of silver.

Pe-tche-li, the principal province of China, bounded on the N. by the Great Wall and part of Tartary, E. by the Yellow Sea, S. by Chang-tong and Ho-nan, and W. by the mountains of Chan-si. It contains nine cities of the first class, which have many others under their jurisdiction. Although Pe-tche-li extends no further than 42. N. lat. yet all its rivers are so much frozen during four months in the year that waggons with the heaviest loads may safely pass them. The soil is sandy, and produces very little rice; but it abounds with all other kinds of grain, and with the greater part of the fruit trees common in Europe. But, what renders this province the most considerable, is that the riches of the whole empire are brought hither, the southern provinces furnishing it with every thing they produce that is most uncommon and delicious. The inhabitants, in general, are reckoned not so polite, nor so apt to learn the sciences, as those of the southern provinces; but they are stronger and more warlike. Their number is estimated at 38,000,000. Peking is the capital.

Peter and Paul, St., or Petropaulskoi, a sea-port of Russia, in Kamtschatka. The town consists of some log-houses and a few conical huts. Captain Clerke, who succeeded captain Cook, and died at sea, was interred here. It is seated on the E. side of Awatka Bay. Long. 158. 48. E., lat. 53. 1. N.

Peter Is Port, St., a market town in the island of Guernsey, with an excellent harbour, defended by two castles.

Peterborough, a city in Northamptonshire, Eng. It is a bishop's see, and contains 8,568 inhabitants; the cathedral was formerly a monastery. The market-place is spacious, the streets regular, and many of the buildings extremely neat. The manufacture of stockings is extensive, and considerable trade is carried on in corn, coal, and timber. 81 m. N. of London. Long. 0. 4. W. lat. 52. 30. N.

Peterborough, p.t. Hillsborough Co. N. H. 40 m. S. W. Concord. Pop. 1,984. Here are manufactures of cotton, woolen, paper, oil, &c.; p.t. Madison Co. N. Y. 122 m. W. Albany.

Peterhead, a sea-port of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, sits on a peninsula, about a m. S. of the mouth of Ugie. It has two harbours, defended by piers; a considerable trade in the fishery, and to the Baltic; and manufactures of thread, woolen cloth, and cotton. Here is a small fort and a battery. A mineral spring, of a powerful diuretic quality, and the sea-bathing, bring a great resort of company, for whose accommodation there is a ball-room and many elegant houses. 34 m. N. E. of Aberdeen. Long. 1. 35. W., lat. 57. 27. N.

Peters, a township of Franklin Co. Pa.

Petersburgh, a government or province of Russia, at the E. extremity of the gulf of Finland. The greater part of this province, was formerly called Ingermanland or Ingria. It comprises an area of 18,000 square miles, with 700,000 inhabitants. Timber forms the chief source of wealth.

Petersburgh, the metropolis of the Russian empire, in the government of the same name, is situated on the river Neva, near the gulf of Finland, and is built partly upon some islands in the mouth of that river, and partly upon the continent. So late as the beginning of the last century, the ground on which Petersburg now stands was only a vast morass, occupied by a few fishermen's huts. Peter the Great first began this city in 1703. He built a small hut for himself, and some wretched wooden hovels. In 1710 the Count Golovkin built the first house of brick, and the next year the emperor, with his own hand, laid the foundation of a house of the same material. From these small beginnings rose the imperial city of Petersburg; and, in less than nine years after the wooden hovels were erected, the seat of empire was transferred from Moscow to this place. The streets, in general are broad and spacious; and three of the principal ones, which meet in a point at the admiralty, are at least two m. in length. The mansions of the nobles are vast piles of building, furnished with great cost, in the same elegant style as at Paris or London, and situated chiefly on the S. side of the Neva, either in the admiralty quarter, or in the suburbs of Livonia and Moscow, which are the finest parts of the city. The views upon the banks of the Neva exhibit the grandest and most lively scenes imaginable. That river is in many places as broad as the Thames at London: it is also deep, rapid, and as transparent as crystal; and its banks are lined on each side with a continued range of grand buildings. (On the N. the fortress, the academy of sciences, and the academy of arts, are the most striking objects. On the opposite side are the imperial palace, the admiralty, the mansions of many Russian nobles, and the English line, so called because it is mostly occupied by English merchants. In the front of these buildings, on the S. side, is the quay, which extends three m. except where it is interrupted by the admiralty: and the Neva, during the whole of that space, has been embanked by a wall, parapet, and pavement of hewn granite. There are no fewer than 35 great churches (almost every sect of Christians being tolerated), and the number of inhabitants is supposed to be about 300,000. It is said that 3,000 one-horse sledges are employed for passengers in the streets, in winter. From its low and marshy situation, it is subject to inundations, which have sometimes risen so high as to threaten the town with a total submersion. The opposite divisions of Petersburg, situated on each side of the Neva, are connected by two bridges on pontoons, which, on account of the large masses of ice driven down the stream from lake Ladoga, are usually removed when these masses first make their appearance; and for a few days, till the river is frozen hard enough to bear carriages, there is no communication between the opposite parts of the town. Among the noblest ornaments of Petersburg is an equestrian statue of Peter the Great, in bronze, erected by Catherine II. in 1782. It is of colossal size, and stands on a huge pedestal of rock, brought there at great expense. Within the walls of the fortress is the cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which are deposited the remains of Peter the Great, and of the successive sovereigns, except Peter II., who was buried at Moscow. The literary and scientific institutions are numerous but the most important is the university, founded in 1819. A Bible society is established on an extensive scale, having upwards of 300 auxiliaries in different parts of the empire. Of the charitable institutions the principal are the foundling hospital, the sailors' hospital, the lazaretto, the asylum for the blind, the asylum for the deaf and dumb, the humane society, &c. The manufactures are various, and some of them of considerable extent; and the commercial intercourse is important from its extensive communication with the interior, this being the only great maritime outlet in the gulf of Finland. The principal exports are hemp, flax, skins, leather, iron, tallow, &c.: the imports sugar, coffee, cotton, indigo, dyewood, spices, hardware, &c. The number of ships that enter the Neva annually, of which nearly half are British, varies from 1,000 to 1,700. In 1831 this city suffered severely by the pestilential cholera. Petersburg is 355 m. N. W. of Moscow, 430 N. E. of Stockholm, and 1,400 E. N. E. of London. Long. 30. 20. E., lat. 59. 56. N.

Philadelphia. See Alla-Sheir.

Philadelphia, a county of the E. district of Pennsylvania comprising 120 sq. m. besides the city of that name and its suburbs. Pop. 188,961.

Philadelphia, the chief city in Pennsylvania and formerly the seat of government, stands on the western bank of the Delaware, 126 miles from the sea by the course of the river and bay, and 5 miles above the confluence of the Delaware and Schuylkill. The site is a perfect level, and the city is built on the most uniform rectangular plan. The houses are of dark colored brick, and the streets from 50 to 100 feet wide; it is probably the most regular city in the world, a circumstance that secures it numberless advantages in the way of convenience, but which deprives it of all that is picturesque and diversified in aspect. It has many buildings of striking elegance; the finest is the United States Bank, which has a front of white marble, on the model of the Parthenon. Another edifice formerly occupied for the same purpose has a handsome marble front of the Corinthian order; some of the other banks, and many of the churches are fine specimens of architecture.

The Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts is a chartered company having for its object the encouragement of the arts of painting, sculpture, architecture and engraving. It has a good collection of paintings, some fine pieces of statuary and a library.

The academy of Natural Sciences have also a good museum and library, and conduct a scientific journal. There are about 40 periodicals in the city including 23 newspapers, 8 of which are daily. Bookselling is an active branch of business, and consists chiefly in the republication of English works.

The manufactures of this city, and the neigh bourhood are principally of cotton cloth, iron, glass, china, carpenter's work, &c. In the mechanic arts no city of the United States is superior to Philadelphia. There are 7 markets in the city, 87 places of public worship, 2 theatres, 13 banks and 10 public schools. In the north-western suburb is the State Prison or Eastern Penitentiary, the largest building in the United States; it is built of granite, and covers a space of 10 acres; the principal front is 670 feet in length.

The arcade has two marble fronts and contains Peal's Museum, the best scientific collection in this country. Here are most of the birds from which Wilson drew the figures which illustrate his work on Ornithology. This museum also contains the most perfect skeleton of the mammoth which has yet been found in this country. The mint of the United States is a neat marble edifice. The University of Pennsylvania, established at this place was founded in 1755; it has 9 instructors and 125 students. The Pennsylvania Hospital, is one of the oldest and best institutions of the kind in the country; it comprises two buildings, one of 278 feet in length; the number of patients is usually about 200. West's painting of Christ healing the sick, presented by the artist to the hospital, is shown in a building attached to the establishment. The Philadelphia library was established by the exertions of Dr Franklin, and now contains 22,000 volumes: the building is ornamented with a marble statue of the founder. The American Philosophical Society have a library of 4,000 volumes. The Athenaeum 2,000. The Academy of Natural Sciences 2,000. The Society of Friends 2,000, and the Hospital 5,000. The Pennsylvania University occupies an edifice originally designed for the residence of the President of the United States.

The Fair Mount Water Works constitute an immense hydraulic establishment upon the Schuylkill a little above the city, for supplying Philadelphia with water; the Schuylkill is dammed, and the water of the river raised into reservoirs holding nearly 20,000,000 gallons. From these the water is conveyed in pipes, amounting in aggregate length to 55 miles, through Philadelphia and the suburbs. These works cost nearly a million and a half of dollars. There are two bridges over the Schuylkill below the water works.

The Delaware at the city is three quarters of a mile wide, and is navigable for ships of the line. The city extends nearly from the Delaware to the Schuylkill. The streets are kept uncommonly clear the markets are well supplied, and living is cheaper than in any other large city in the United States. It is a very agreeable place of residence except in summer, when the heat is intense. It was founded by William Penn in 1682; and is governed by a Mayor, two councils and a board of aldermen. The expenses of the city in 1830 were 255,551 dollars. In commerce it is the fourth city in the union: in 1828 the shipping owned here amounted to 104,080 tons. It is in N. lat. 39. 57. W., Long. 75. 18. 138 m. N. E. Washington; 100 N. E. Baltimore; 90 S. W. New York; 300 S. W. Boston. Pop. 167,811. Philadelphia, p.t. Jefferson Co. N. Y. 173 m. N. W. Albany. Pittsburg, city, Alleghany Co. Pa. the chief town in the western part of the state. It stands upon a point of land at the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers, which here take the name of Ohio. It is built on a regular plan upon the slope of an eminence, and a level plain at its foot. It is finely situated for trade, and enjoys a communication by steamboats with all the great towns on the Ohio and Mississippi; but it is most distinguished for its large and flourishing manufactures of glass, iron, woolen and cotton. for which see Pennsylvania. The surrounding country is exceedingly rich in bituminous coal, which is delivered at the houses for three cents the bushel. The constant use of this fuel causes a perpetual cloud of black smoke to hang over the place. The suburbs, Birmingham and Alleghany, lie on the opposite sides of the two rivers and communicate with the city by bridges. Pittsburg is a very flourishing place; it is not a handsomely built town; yet it contains some neat edifices. Pop. 12,542.

Poland, a large country of Europe, bounded on the N. by Prussia, Courland, Livonia, and Russia W. by the Baltic, Brandenburg, and Silesia, S. by Hungary and Moldavia, and E. by Russia and the territories wrested by that power from the Turks. It was formerly divided into four principal parts, Great Poland, Little Poland, Red Russia, and Lithuania. In 1772 a partition of this country, projected by the king of Prussia, was effected by that monarch, in conjunction with the empress of Russia and the emperor of Germany. By this partition one-third of the country was wrested from the republic, the diet being compelled, by a foreign force, to make and to ratify this important cession. The three partitioning powers, moreover, forcibly effected a great change in the constitution. In 1791, however, the king and the nation, in concurrence, almost unanimously, and without any foreign intervention, established another constitution, and one so unexceptionable every way that it was celebrated by Mr. Burke as a revolution whereby the conditions of all were made better and the rights of none infringed. By it the broils of an elective monarchy, of which Poland, on almost every vacancy of the throne, had been involved in the calamities of war, were avoided, the throne being declared hereditary in the house of Saxony. A few of the nobility, however, discontented at the generous sacrifice of some of their privileges, repaired to the court of Russia; and, their representations concurring with the ambitious views of the empress, she sent an army into Poland, under pretext of being guarantee of the constitution of 1772. Her interference was too powerful to be resisted; and this new constitution was overthrown. But the principal object for which the Russian army entered Poland was not yet attained. The empress had planned, in conjunction with the king of Prussia, a second partition of this country, which took place in 1793. Such multiplied oppressions at last roused the spirit of the nation. General Kosciusko appeared, in 1794, at the head of a Polish army, to assert the independence of his country, and to recover the provinces wrested from it. He was successful at first, against the king of Prussia; but was at length overpowered by numbers; the country was in different parts desolated, the houses burnt, and the inhabitants massacred in crowds. The brave Kosciusko was taken prisoner, and sent with a number of other patriots into confinement at Petersburg, for having dared to defend his native country against foreign aggression. The king formerly resigned his crown at Grodno, in 1795, and was afterwards removed to Petersburg, where he remained a state prisoner, till his death, in 1796. The whole of the country was divided among the three partitioning powers. Austria had Little Poland, and the greatest part of Red Russia and Podolia, which is now called the kingdom of Galicia; Prussia had Great Poland, Polish Prussia, a small part of Lithuania, and Polachia; and Russia had Samogitia, the remainder of Lithuania, Volhinia, and Podolia. In the war with Prussia, in 1806, the French penetrated into Poland, and proclaimed their desire to restore its ancient independence, when, treaties of peace having been adjusted with Russia and Prussia, the project was for the most part abandoned. By the peace of Tilsit, the king of Prussia renounced the possession of the greater part of his Polish provinces, when they were erected into the dukedom of Warsaw, in favor of the king of Saxony. In 1809 Austria was compelled to cede part of Galicia to Russia, and a further portion to the new states. But on the retreat of the French army out of Poland, in 1813, the Russians took possession of the duchy of Warsaw, and the congress of Vienna not only confirmed to that power all the Polish and Lithuanian provinces acquired before 1795, but added the sovereignty of the central provinces, which form the present kingdom of Poland.

The towns of Poland are for the most part built with wood; and the villages consist of mean cottages, or huts. The country is so fertile in corn, in many places, that it supplies Sweden and Holland with large quantities, and it has extensive pastures. Peat, ochre, chalk, belemnites, agate, chalcedony, cornelians, onyxes, jasper, rock crystals, amethysts, garnets, topazes, sapphires, and even rubies and diamonds are found in Poland; also talc, spar, lapis calaminaris, coal, iron, lead, and quicksilver. Here is much leather, fur, hemp, flax, saltpetre, alum, manna, honey, and wax; and there are mines of salt, of a great depth, out of which is dug rock-salt. Horses are numerous, very strong, swift, and beautiful; and horned cattle are bred in immense numbers.

Poland, the central portion of the preceding country, erected into a separate state in 1815. It comprises the chief part of that which, from 1807 to 1813, formed the duchy of Warsaw, and is bounded by the respective acquisitions of Russia, Austria, and Prussia. The form of the territory is a square of 200 m; in the middle stands the capital, Warsaw; but there is also a detached tract extending N. E. towards Lithuania. Its area is 47,000 square m. and its population 3,472,500. It is subject to the same sovereign as Russia, but is governed in every respect as a separate monarchy, the czar being represented by a viceroy. The prevailing religion is the Catholic, but Protestants are numerous, as are also the Jews.

This remnant of the great republic of Poland has rendered itself noted for the desperate attempt which it made in 1830 and 1831 to throw off the Russian yoke. The Polish constitution granted in 1815 by the Emperor Alexander, had been repeatedly violated, and many causes of animosity between the Poles and their oppressors tended to embitter their servitude. The Grand Duke Constantine, commander in chief of the army, outraged the feelings of the nation by his insulting demeanor towards the soldiery. At length inspired by the recent example of the French and Belgians the Poles rose in insurrection at Warsaw on the 29th of November 1830; the revolt immediately spread throughout the kingdom and extended into Lithuania and other parts of ancient Poland. An obstinate and sanguinary war commenced, and the Poles animated by the greatness of the object for which they were contending, and hoping for aid from the powers of western Europe, obtained some advantages in the outset which seemed to promise a successful result to their heroic efforts. But none of the European powers stirred in their behalf; the Russians poured in fresh armies, and Poland overpowered by numbers, was forced to submit in the autumn of 1831. This unfortunate country now groans under a heavier tyranny than before. To the Russian armies that crushed the revolution, Europe owes the further infliction of the pestilential cholera. This disorder was introduced by them from Asia into Poland during the campaign of 1831, and spread over a great part of Europe.

It is divided into the governments of Stettin, Stralsund and Coeslin, and is watered by several rivers, of which the Oder, Peene, Ucker, Rega, Persante Ihna, Stolpen, and Leho are the most considerable. The air is pretty cold, but compensated by the fertility of the soil, which abounds in pastures and corn, of which a great deal is exported. The country is flat, contains many lakes, woods, and forests, and has several good harbours. It was formerly an independent duchy of the German empire, and was divided into Hither and Further Pomerania. The latter, and part of Hither Pomerania, were seized by the king of Prussia, and confirmed to him in 1720; the remainder N. of the Seene was ceded by the king of Sweden, at the treaty of Kiel in 1814, to the king of Denmark, in exchange for Norway, but soon after came to Prussia in exchange for Saxe Lauenburg.

Pomerania, a district of W. Prussia, extending W. from the river Vistula to the duchy of Pomerania, of which it was formerly a part. It is now included in the government of Dantzic.

Pomona, or Mainland, the largest of the Orkney Islands, being 24 miles long and from 4 to 10 broad; but intersected by numerous arms of the sea. The general appearance of the country is much the same as the Mainland of Shetland; but the soil is more fertile, and in some parts better cultivated. Kirkwall is the capital. See Orkneys.

Pondicherry, a town of Hindoostan, in the Carnatic. It was first settled by the French in 1674; and previously to the war, of 1756 was a fine city. It extended along the sea coast above a mile, was three-quarters of a mile in breadth, and had a citadel then the best of its kind in India. The city has been repeatedly taken by the English, particularly in 1761 (when it was immediately razed, in retaliation of M. Lally's conduct towards Fort St. David) and the last time in 1793. It was restored to the French at the general peace 86 m. S. by W. of Madras. Long. 79. 53. E., lat. 11. 42. N.

Poona, a city of Hindoostan, the modern capital of the Mahratta empire. At the bottom of Parvate Hill, in the vicinity, is a large square field enclosed with high brick walls, where the Peishwa used to assemble the Brahmins, to whom he gave alms at the great feast, when the rainy season terminated. The view from this hill commands the town with all its gardens and plantations, the cantonments, and the British residency at the Sungum. The town is entirely defenceless, the streets long and narrow, and the houses very irregularly built. The more respectable dwellings are raised with large blocks of granite to the height of about 14 feet, after which the superstructure is composed of timber frames, with slight brick walls; those of the common people are only one story high, with tiled roofs. The palace is surrounded by high and thick brick walls, with round towers at the angles, and has only one entrance. The affairs of government are under the direction of the British resident. 100 m. S. E. of Bombay. Long. 73. 55. E., lat. 18. 30. N.

Popa Madre, a town of Terra Firma, with a convent and chapel of the virgin, to which the Spaniards in those parts go in pilgrimage, especially those who have been at sea. It is seated on a high mountain, 50 m. E. of Carthagena. Long. 74. 32. W., lat. 10. 15. N.

Popayan, a province in the W. part of New Granada. A chain of barren mountains runs through the country from N. to S., and the soil near the sea is flat, marshy, and often flooded by the rains.

Popayan, the capital of the foregoing province, and the most ancient city erected by Europeans in this part of America. It contains a cathedral, several churches and convents, and two nunneries. The trade is considerable, and the inhabitants are estimated at 25,000, chiefly mulattoes. It stands in a large plain, 200 m. W. S. W. of Santa Fe and 240 N. E. of Quito. Long. 75. 55. W., lat. 2. 35. N.

Pope, a county of Illinois. Pop. 3,323. Golconda is the capital.

Popedom, or Ecclesiastical States, a country of Italy, bounded N. by the Po, which separates it from the Austrian states, E. by the Adriatic, S. by Naples, and W. by Tuscany. It is 130 m long and from 80 to 100 broad, divided into the delegations of Bologna, Ferrara, Forlì, Ravenna, Urbino and Pesaro, Ancona, Fermo, Pontecorvo, Macerata, Perugia, Spoleto, Viterbo, Ascoli, Benevento, Camerino, Civita Vecchia, and Rieti. The papal government is a bar to industry, and ill calculated to promote the happiness of its subjects; the country is consequently badly cultivated and thinly inhabited. Trade and manufactures are but little encouraged; and were it not for dates, figs, almonds, olives, and other fruits, which grow spontaneously, the indolence of the inhabitants is such that they would be absolutely starved. The pope, according to the ancient canon law, is the supreme, universal, and independent head of the church, and is invested with sovereignty over all Christian sovereigns, communities, and individuals. He has the titles of holy father and holiness, and is elected at every vacancy from among the cardinals, each of whom is styled his eminence. Their number was fixed by Sixtus V. at 70. in allusion to the number of the disciples sent out by Christ to teach the world—an allusion without any remarkable propriety, as no two classes of people could be more unlike. The annual revenue of the pope, which formerly amounted to upwards of £2,000,000 sterling, is now reduced to about £600,000, including the exactions in foreign countries. His military force is inconsiderable; his naval force consists of a few galleys, stationed at Civita Vecchia. In 1798 this state was taken possession of by the French, who overturned its ancient government, and erected it into a republic, styled the Roman republic, under the direction of five consuls. They obliged the pope, Pius VI., to remove from Rome, first into Tuscany, and afterwards into France, where he died at Valence, August 19th, 1799. In December following, a conclave was held at Venice, and on March 13th, 1800, cardinal Chiaramonti was elected to the papal chair, under the title of Pius VII., and assumed the sovereignty. A concordat was concluded for France in 1803, and in 1804, Napoleon was crowned by the pope; but in 1807 the emperor became imperious, while the pope maintained a strong feeling of independence. Measures of violence were resorted to; Rome was occupied by French troops; the pope was removed into France, and his states transformed into a kingdom, under Napoleon's son. He continued a kind of prisoner till the allies had invaded France in 1814, when he was restored to most of his former prerogatives. He died in 1823, and was succeeded by cardinal Annibal della Genga, under the title of Leo XII., on whose death, in 1826, cardinal Francesco Saverio Castiglioni (the present pontiff) was elected to the papal chair and took the title of Pius VIII. Rome is the capital.

Porto, a small sea-port of the papal states, in the patrimony of St. Peter. It is the see of a bishop (who is generally a cardinal), dependent only on the pope, and is seated on the W. side of the Tiber, 10 m. S. W. of Rome.

Porto Bello, a sea-port of Terra Firma, on the N. coast of the isthmus of Darien, nearly opposite Panama on the S. coast. It is a very unhealthy place; and the country around it swarms with toads and other reptiles in the rainy season. Before the abolition of the trade by the galleons, in 1748, and the introduction of register ships, this place was the great mart for the rich commerce of Peru and Chile. The town stands close to the sea, on the side of a mountain that surrounds the harbour, which is safe and commodious. It was taken in 1742 by admiral Vernon, who demolished the fortifications; but it has since been strongly fortified. It is 60 m. N. by E. of Panama and 300 W. of Carthage. Long. 79. 50. W., lat. 9. 33. N.

Porto Cabello, a sea-port of Venezuela, S. America, with a good harbour, defended by forts. It is a flourishing place, containing a population of 8,000, and is the centre of the navigation and commerce of Venezuela. 70 m. W. by S. of Jago de Leon. Long. 67. 32. E., lat. 10. 31. N.

Porto Farino, a sea-port of the kingdom of Tunis. Long. 10. 16. E., lat. 37. 12. N.

Porto Ferrajo, the capital of the island of Elba, with a good harbour, capable of containing the largest fleets. This town is celebrated as having been the residence of Napoleon from May 4, 1814, to February 26, 1815, when he sailed on his final expedition to France. Its position is central in the Mediterranean; and it perfectly commands the coast of Italy. It is a very pretty town, built on a shelving rock, that closes in a circular bay, about 2 m. deep and as many in breadth. The land all round is high and woody, and the entrance to the bay is easy of approach. The streets and fortifications rise one above another, like rows of seats in an ancient amphitheatre, and present a most beautiful spectacle to those who approach by water. A commodious quay communicates, by means of large flights of steps, with all the streets. Porto Ferrajo was built and fortified by Cosmo I. duke of Florence in 1548; but the fortifications were not finished till 1628, when Cosmo II. completed them with a magnificence equal to that displayed by the old Romans in their public undertakings; and it is now deemed impregnable. The gates are decorated with sculpture, and the rings for fastening cables to are of carved bronze. 7 m. S. W. of Piombino, on the coast of Italy. Long. 12. 17. E., lat. 42. 53. N.

Porto Fino, a small sea-port on the coast of Genoa, with a fort, situate between two mountains, 13 m. S. E. of Genoa.

Porto Galate, a town of Spain, in Biscay, seated in a small bay, 10 m. N. W. of Bilbao.

Porto Greco, a town of Naples, in the Capitanata, near the gulf of Venice, 16 m. N. W. of Manfredonia.

Porto Gruaro, a town of Austrian Italy, in Friuli, seated on the Lema, 20 m. W. by S. of Palma Nova.

Porto Longone, a sea-port on the S. E. side of the Isle of Elba, with a good harbour, and a fortress upon a rock, almost inaccessible. It is 4 m. S. E. of Porto Ferrajo and 35 N. W. of Orbitello, on the coast of Italy. Long. 10. 20. E., lat. 42. 50. N.

Porto Marin, a town of Spain, in Galicia, 48 m. E. of Compostella.

Porto Praya, a town and bay of St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verde islands. The town stands on an elevated plain, and is the residence of the Portuguese governor of the islands. Long. 23. 29. W., lat. 14. 54. N.

Porto del Principe, a sea-port on the N. coast of Cuba, with a good harbour. Near it are several springs of bitumen. Long. 78. 15. W., lat. 21. 52. N.

Porto Real, a sea-port of Spain, in Andalusia, on the E. side of the bay of Cadiz, 7 m. E. of Cadiz.

Porto Rico, an island of the W. Indies, 60 m. E. of St. Domingo, belonging to the Spaniards. It is 120 m. long and 40 broad, diversified with woods, valleys, and plains, and watered by springs and rivers, but unhealthy in the rainy season. It produces sugar, rum, ginger, cotton, maize, and rice; and there are so many cattle that they are often killed for the sake of the skins alone. St. Juan de Porto Rico is the capital.

Porto Santo, an island in the Atlantic, the least of the Madeiras, 15 m. in circumference. In 1518 a Portuguese ship, coasting along the African shore, was driven out to sea by a sudden squall, and, when they all expected to perish, they discovered this island, which, on account of their escape, they named Porto Santo; and hence they described the island of Madeira. It produces little corn; but there are oxen and wild hogs, and a vast number of rabbits. Its most valuable productions are dragons' blood, honey, and wax. It has no harbour, but good anchorage in the road. Long. 16. 25. W., lat. 32. 53. N.

Porto Seguro, a fertile province of Brazil, S. of that of Ilheos and N. of Spiritu Santo. The capital, of the same name, is seated on the top of a rock, at the mouth of a river that flows into the Atlantic. Long. 40. 0. W., lat. 16. 20. S.

Port Vecchio, a sea-port of Corsica, seated on a bay on the E. coast of the island, 38 m. S. E. of Ajaccio. Long. 9. 10. E., lat. 41. 40. N.

Porto Venero, a sea-port on the coast of Genoa, at the entrance of the gulf of Spezzia. It has a good harbour, and is seated on the side of a hill, at the top of which is a fort, 5 m. S. of Spezzia. Long. 9. 38. E., lat. 44. 5. N.

Portree, a town of Scotland, on the E. side of the Isle of Skye, one of the Hebrides. The inhabitants trade chiefly in black cattle, sheep, and kelp. It has an excellent harbour, sheltered at its mouth by the Isle of Raaza. Long. 6. 16. W., lat. 57. 33. N.

Portsea, an island between Chichester Bay and the harbour of Portsmouth, in Hampshire, Eng. It is a low tract, about 14 m. in circumference, separated from the mainland on the N. by a creek, over which are two bridges, one for the entrance and the other for the departure of passengers.

At the S. W. extremity of it, is situate the town of Portsmouth.

Portsmouth, a borough and sea-port in Hampshire, Eng. It is the most considerable haven for men of war, and the most strongly fortified place in England. Its capacious harbour is made by a bay running up between the island of Portsea, on which the town is situate, and the opposite peninsula, having a narrow entrance commanded by the town and forts. Many of the largest ships are always laid up here: and in time of war, it is the principal rendezvous of the grand channel fleet. The docks, arsenals, storehouses, barracks, &c., are all of capital magnitude, and kept in the most perfect order. To the S. of the town is the noted road of Spithead, where the men of war anchor when prepared for actual service. Portsmouth has one spacious church, and contains 7,269 inhabitants. Portsea, built on what was formerly called Portsmouth Common, is now become much larger than the parent town, containing a population of 34,785. 72 m. S. W. London Long. 1. 6. W., lat. 50. 47. N.

Portsmouth, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H. at the mouth of the Piscataqua with an excellent harbour. It is the only sea-port in the state, and has considerable commerce. Here is a navy yard of the United States. The town has 7 churches, a branch of the U. S. Branch bank, 2 insurance offices, and an atheneum. Two bridges cross the river to Kittery in Maine. In December 1813 a fire destroyed 397 buildings here. It is 24 m. N. N. E. Newburyport, 56. m. N. by E. Boston and 54 S. S. W. Portland. Pop. 8,032. Lat. 43. 5. N. Lon. 70. 45. W.

Ohio, on the Scioto near its junction with the Ohio. 90 m. S. Cumberland. Pop. 1,063. The Ohio canal, which see, leaves the river at this place; p.t. Carteret Co. N. C. near Ocracoke Inlet.

Portsoy, a sea-port of Scotland, in Banffshire, with manufactures of fine linen and sewing thread. The vicinity is celebrated for its minerals, especially for a fine vein of serpentine, called Portsoy marble: a species of asbestos, of a greenish color, which has been wrought into incombustible cloth; and a brilliant kind of granite of a flesh color. Portsoy stands on a point of land projecting into Murray Frith, 9 m. W. Banff.

Portsville, p.v. Alleghany Co. N. Y.

Portugal, the most western country on the continent of Europe, bounded on the W. and S. by the Atlantic, Ocean, and E. and N. by Spain. It extends from 36. 56. to 43. 20. N. lat., and from 6. 25. to 9. 30. W. long., and is divided into the provinces of Entre Douro-e-Minho, Tras os Montes, Beira, Estremadura, Alentejo, and Algarve. It contains 36,510 sq. m. and a pop. of 3,782,550. Though Spain and Portugal are in the same climate, yet the air of the latter is much more temperate than that of the former, on account of the neighbourhood of the sea. Agriculture is in a very backward state; the implements of industry are of the rudest construction, and very little corn is raised. Indian corn, imported from Africa, is used by the peasants instead of wheat. Lemons flourish here in great abundance. This fruit was introduced into the country from the east by the Arabs. Olives, vineyards, oranges, nuts, almonds, figs, and raisins are plentiful, and in the low grounds rice and maize are cultivated.

The inhabitants also make considerable quantities of salt with the sea-water, especially in the bay of St. Ubes, whence a great deal is exported. Their export trade consists of the produce of their own country, and the merchandise which they receive from their foreign possessions, comprising Madeira, Cape Verd Islands, some settlements in Africa, Goa, and Macao: the latter consists of wine, sugar, tobacco, cotton, indigo, hides, and many excellent drugs. The horses of Portugal were formerly in great esteem; but they are now so fond of mules that horses are scarce. Towards the frontiers of Spain there are mountains, in which gold and silver were formerly found; and the river Tajo was anciently celebrated by the poets for its golden sands. There are also mines of iron, tin, lead, quarries of marble, and some precious stones. The Portuguese are indolent and luxurious. Plays and church festivals, bull fights, balls, music, &c., engross the whole attention of those who are not compelled to labour for their subsistence. The peasants are in a state of vassalage, and subsist on the hardest fare. In many respects they bear a striking resemblance to the Highlanders of Scotland. The principal rivers are the Tagus, Douro, Guadiana, Mondego, and Caldao. The government is an absolute monarchy. Formerly it had its Cortes or representative body, but, from 1697 to the recent revolution, they were never assembled. The established religion is the Roman Catholic; and there are two archbishops and 13 bishops.

Portugal appears to have been known at an early period to the Phenicians and Carthaginians. It subsequently followed the fortune of Spain, and, after being the scene of various military operations, was finally reduced and constituted a Roman province under Augustus. The Romans were succeeded by the Goths and other barbarians. The Saracens, or Moors, invaded the peninsula from Africa, and after the battle of Xeres, A. D. 712, set up several kingdoms, and were not expelled from Portugal till the 13th century. In 1092 Alphonso VI., king of Castile and Leon, made Henry of Burgundy, grandson of Robert king of France, count of Portugal, as a reward for assisting him against the Moors. Alphonso, son of Henry, was the first king. The last of his descendants by the male line dying in 1580, Philip II. of Spain took possession of the throne in right of his mother. The rapacity of the Spanish viceroys was so great that in 1640, the Portuguese revolted, and made John IV., duke of Braganza, king. In 1807 the British fleet preserved the royal family from falling into the hands of Bonaparte, and conveyed them to Brazil. Portugal itself, also, after a long and severe contest, was delivered from the French yoke by English armies under the command of the duke of Wellington and other generals. The Queen died at Rio Janeiro, March 20, 1816, in the 82nd year of her age, and the prince regent became king. At the conclusion of the general peace, the people became discontented, partly through the degradation of the kingdom to the situation of a dependent colony, and partly through the maladministration of the regency. Plot after plot was formed, in which many officers of distinction were implicated, who, as soon as they were detected, were removed, and replaced by British officers. This only served to increase the discontent both of the people and of the army, and to hasten a revolution. Every thing having been previously arranged between the civil and military authorities, a new constitution was announced at Oporto August 24, 1820, and in September a council of regency was formed at Lisbon, and letters issued to assemble the cortes. John VI. by a royal decree issued at Rio Janeiro, February 1821, approved of the constitution, and, leaving his eldest son Don Pedro as regent of Brazil, returned to Portugal, and took an oath to maintain the new constitution, July 4, 1821. On the 12th of October, 1822, the Brazilians proclaimed the prince regent constitutional emperor of Brazil, and the independence of that empire has been since acknowledged by the court of Lisbon. On the 30th of April, 1824, Don Miguel, the king's youngest son, general of the army, surrounded with guards the palace of his father, in order to depose him, and to make his nephew regent. The foreign ambassadors discountenanced the conspiracy; the king took refuge on board an English man of war; under the protection of Britain he resumed the government; and Don Miguel left the kingdom. John VI. died in March, 1826.

As soon as Pedro IV. heard of his father's death, he declared his determination to remain in Brazil, and to abdicate the throne of Portugal in favour of his daughter Donna Maria da Gloria (who was born in 1819), on condition that his brother Don Miguel should marry her, and that a free constitution should be adopted as contained in a charter which he sent over from Brazil. The acceptance of this charter was resisted by the ultra-royalist faction at Lisbon, and a rebellion took place under the direction of the marquis of Chaves. In consequence of the invasion of the kingdom by the rebels, who had mustered their armies in Spain, the sister of Pedro IV., who had by him been appointed regent, claimed the assistance of George IV.; who, in compliance with ancient treaties between the two kingdoms, sent an army to Lisbon in 1827, which checked the rebellion. Don Miguel, who resided at Vienna, returned to Lisbon in the spring of 1828, having first visited Paris and London, at both which places he professed his determination to adhere to the constitution. The professions of Don Miguel soon appeared to be insincere, and on the 30th of June he assumed the title of king of Portugal and Algarve. A weak resistance was made by the garrison and inhabitants of Oporto, but it was soon overcome, and Don Miguel now reigns as absolute king. Lisbon is the capital.

Possades, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, seated on the Guadalquivir, 19 m. S. W. of Cordova.

Poesta, a town on the E. coast of the island of Sardinia, 45 m. E. S. E. of Castle Aragonese. Long. 9. 30. E., lat. 40. 36. N.

Poesga, a town of Sclavonia, capital of a palatinate of the same name. It was taken from the Turks, by the Austrians in 1687; and is seated near the Orlava, 18 m. N. N. W. of Brod.

Posen, Grand duchy of, a province of the Prussian states, comprising that part of Poland which was restored to Prussia in 1815. On the E. it is bounded by the new kingdom of Poland, and S. and W. by Silesia and Brandenburg. It is divided into the two governments of Posen and Bromberg, contains about 12,000 sq. m. with 800,000 inhabitants, and is watered by the Netze, the Wartha, the Obra, and the Brahe.

Posen, the capital of Prussian Poland, and of the government of the same name, is a bishop's see, and has a university, and a castle on an island in the river Wartha. The cathedral is magnificent. The suburbs are extensive, and contain many fine buildings. The river Wartha frequently inundates the town, but is very beneficial to its trade with Germany. By the partition of Poland, in 1773, Posen became subject to the king of Prussia. In 1806 it was entered by the French army, under marshal Davoust, and added to the duchy of Warsaw, till 1815, when it was restored to Prussia. It is seated in a pleasant plain, 27 m. W. by S. of Gnesna. Long. 17. 0. E., lat. 52. 24. N.

Posey, a county of Indiana. Pop. 6,883. Mount Vernon is the capital.

Pomerck, a town of Saxony, in the principality of Aldenburg. It has manufactures of cloth and leather, and is seated on the Gams, near its conflux with the Orla, 8 m. N. E. of Saalfeld.

Possession Island, an island in the S. Pacific, near the N. point of New Holland. Here captain Cook hoisted the British colours, and took possession of all the E. or N. E. coast of New Holland in the name of king George III., which he called New S. Wales. Long. 141. 39. E., lat. 10. 33. S.

Possession Island, an uninhabited island in the S. Pacific. Long. 141. 40. E., lat. 46. 30. S.

Possinko, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, 10 m. N. E. of Santarem.

Post Oak, p.v. Roane Co. Ten.

Potenza, a town of Naples, in Basilicata, seated near the source of the Basiento, 11 m. S. by W. of Acerenza.

Potomac, a river of the United States, which rises in the N. W. part of Virginia, and separates that state from Maryland, almost its whole course, till it enters the W. side of Chesapeake Bay. It is navigable nearly 300 m. for large ships and where it enters the Chesapeake is 7 1-2 m. wide. Its whole length is 550 m. The passage of the Potomac, through the mountains of the Blue Ridge, at Harper's Ferry, presents the appearance of an immense rent, three quarters of a mile wide, through a stupendous wall of rocks. The broken fragments of the mountain which lie scattered all around, and its craggy front, torn down to the base, attest the violence of the disruption, and forcibly remind the spectator of the period, when the mountain ridge opposed a barrier to the stream, and when its collected waters swelled to such a mass as to tear away the mountain from its foundation. Washington, Alexandria and Georgetown are situated upon this river.

Potomac and Ohio Canal, called also the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, is designed to unite the Potomac with the Ohio. It leaves the Potomac at Georgetown and proceeds up the north-eastern bank of the river through the mountains, by a tunnel 4 miles in length, and down the valleys of the Youghiogeny and Monongahela to the Ohio.

Its length will be 360 m. and its width 60 feet. It was begun July 4th 1828.

Potosi, a town of Bolivia. Here are the best silver mines in all America, in a mountain in the form of a sugar-loaf. Silver was as common in this place as iron is in Europe; but the mines are now much exhausted, or at least little is obtained in comparison of what was formerly produced. The country around is naked and barren. The town is seated at the bottom of the mountain of Potosi, 260 m. W. N. W. of Arica. Long. 67. 30. W., lat. 19. 50. S.

Potosi, p.t. Washington Co. Missouri, 70 m. W. S. W. St. Louis. It is surrounded by numerous lead mines. See Missouri.

Potodam, a province of the Prussian states, in Brandenburg, comprehending the districts formerly termed the Ucker Mark, the Mark of Prenz, and the greatest part of the Middle Mark. It is bounded N. by Pomerania and W. Prussia, and S. and W. by Saxony. The city of Berlin, with a small district lying around it, forms a distinct government. Potodam contains an area of about 8,000 sq. m., with 488,000 inhabitants.

Potodam, the capital of the foregoing government, situated on an island formed by the rivers Spree and Havel. The public buildings display great magnificence and taste. The royal palace is an admirable structure, and the houses near it are almost all built in the Italian style. In the market place is a marble obelisk, 75 feet in height; also marble statues of the first four kings of Prussia. The garrison church is large, and has a marble pulpit, under which is the tomb of the Great Frederick, whose remains are enclosed in a wooden coffin, covered with copper, without any ornament or victorious trophies, to recall the memory of his actions. On a hill, near the city, is the royal palace of Sans Souci, which is only one story high, yet remarkable for its grandeur and magnificence. The inhabitants of Potodam have manufactures of silk, velvet, cotton, linen, &c. It was entered without opposition on the 24th of October, 1805, by the French, who carried away with exultation the sword and scarf worn by the immortal Frederick during the seven years' war. 13 m. W. S. W. of Berlin. Long. 13. 49. E., lat. 52. 52. N.

Potsdam, p.t. St. Lawrence Co. N. Y. 90 m. W. Plattsburg. Pop. 3,650.

Pragilas, a town of the Sardinian states in Piedmont, 7 m. W. of Turin.

Prague, the capital of Bohemia, and formerly an archiepiscopal see. It comprehends four towns, the Old, New, and Little Town, and the Hradschin. It is 15 m. in circumference, is built upon seven hills, and contains 85,000 inhabitants. The Muldan runs through the city, separating the Old Town from the New, and over it is a bridge of 18 arches, with a strong tower at each end. The Old Town is very populous; the houses are high and the streets narrow. In this part are the remains of a palace, where the ancient kings resided; but the finest ornament is the university, frequented by a great number of students; here also is a magnificent college, formerly belonging to the Jesuits, and the Jews have nine synagogues. The New Town contains fine structures, handsome gardens, and large streets; also an arsenal, and a secular foundation, whose abbess was a princess of the empire. The Little Town, which is the most ancient part of Prague, has broad streets, and is very populous. The Hradschin once belonged to the Little Town but in 1756 it was made the fourth town of Prague: its principal buildings are the royal palace, in which is a hall, 100 paces long and 40 broad, without any pillar to support the roof; the cathedral of St. Veit, containing the buryal-place of the kings and many relics; the chapel of Our Lady of Loretto; the magnificent archiepiscopal palace; and the large palace of Tschernin. Prague has suffered frequent devastation by war. The White Mountain, without the gate of Strahow, is celebrated for the victory gained in 1620 by the Austrians over Frederic V., the elector palatine, whom the Bohemians had chosen for their king. In 1631 Prague was taken by the Saxons; and by the Swedes in 1648. It was taken by storm in 1741 by the French, who were obliged to leave it in 1742. In 1757 it was besieged by the king of Prussia, after a great victory, obtained near this city, over the Austrians; but the defeat at Kollin obliged him to raise the siege. 75 m. S. E. of Dresden. Presburg, a city of Hungary. It is seated on the Danube, which is here very rapid, and about 250 yards in breadth. The inhabitants are estimated at 30,000. Its castle, a noble Gothic structure, was burned down in the commencement of the present century. This town was declared by a royal decree of 1536, the capital of Hungary, on account of its vicinity to Vienna, and the sovereigns are still crowned in its cathedral; but the principal officers of government reside at Buda, and the diets and supreme courts of judicature meet at Perth. In December, 1805, a treaty of peace was concluded here between Austria and France. 38 m. E. by S. of Vienna and 95 W. N. W. of Buda. Long 17. 9. E., lat. 48. 9. N.

Prescot, a town of Lancashire, Eng. It is a long straggling town, and may be said to be built almost over coal pits, several being worked close to its extremities. It is estimated that 2,000 persons are employed in the collieries of Prescot; whence Liverpool is chiefly supplied with fuel. Here are manufactures of watch movements, pinion wire, small files, and coarse earthen ware; and also some manufactories of cotton, hats, &c. 8 m. E. of Liverpool and 197 N. N. W. of London.

The channel to the mainland is a safe road for ships. This island was purchased of the king of Queda by the English E. India Company, who formed a settlement here in 1786; and, in five years after, Georgetown, its capital, was established as a sea-port. The inhabitants were estimated in 1805 at 14,000, since which time they have considerably increased, Long. 98. 50 E., lat. 5. 36. N.

Prince William Henry's Island, an island in the Eastern Ocean, lying W. N. W. of Tench Island. It is pretty high, well wooded, and about 70 m. in circuit. The population is estimated at 50,000. It was discovered by lieutenant Ball in 1790, and a high mountain in the centre was called Mount Philip. Long. 149. 30. E., lat. 1. 32. S.—Also the name of an island in the Pacific Ocean, discovered by captain Wallis in 1767. Long. 141. 6. W., lat. 17. 0. S.

Prince William Sound, a gulf on the N. W. coast of America, discovered by Cook in 1778, and visited and explored by Vancouver in 1794. The dress of both sexes is a sort of close robe, made of the skins of various animals, and commonly worn with the hairy side outward, sometimes reaching only to the knees, but generally to the ankles. The men often paint their faces of a black colour, and of a bright red, and sometime of a blueish or leaden hue; but not in regular figure. The women puncture or stain the chin with black, that comes to a point on each of their cheeks. Their canoes are of two sorts; the one large and open, the other small and covered: the framing consists of slender pieces of wood, and the outside is composed of the skins of seals, or other sea animals stretched over the wood. Their weapons, and implements for hunting and fishing, resemble those used by the Esquimaux. The principal animals are bears, common and pine martens, sea otters, seals, racoons, small ermines, foxes, and the whitish cat or lynx. The birds found here are the falcon, the great king-fisher, the white-headed eagle, and the humming bird. Long. 147. 21. W., lat. 50. 33. N.

Providence, one of the Bahama Islands, and the best of those planted by the English. It was taken by the Spaniards, in 1782, but retaken the next year. A light-house was erected, in 1804, on an eminence overlooking Nassau, the chief town. Long. 77. 20. W., lat. 25. 3. N.

Providence, an island in the Atlantic, which the Buccaneers fortified, but afterwards abandoned. It is 150 m. E. of the coast of Nicaragua. Long. 80. 44. W., lat. 13. 25. N.

Providence river, a stream of Rhode Island formed by the union of two rivers just above the city of Providence. It flows into Narraganset Bay, and is navigable from Providence to the sea for ships of 900 tons.

Providence, city, chief of a county of the same name in Rhode Island, is the largest place in the state and the second city in New England for population, wealth, and business. It stands at the head of Narraganset Bay, which at this extremity becomes narrowed to the width of a river. It is built on both sides of the river, the two parts being connected by a bridge. The new town on the W. of the river has all the bustle and liveliness, and displays the flourishing appearance of a commercial city. The hill on the opposite side, or East Providence, is chiefly occupied by private mansions, beautifully situated, and adorned with gardens and court yards. On the summit of a steep eminence stands the col-age, overlooking the city. The streets are irregular, but there are many beautiful situations and fine edifices in the city. Here is a handsome arcade three stories high, with 28 rooms on each floor. Each front consists of an Ionic portico, with granite pillars. Providence has 12 churches, a theatre, a public library, many cotton and woolen manufactories, paper mills, dye-houses, &c. Its distance from the sea is 35 miles, but merchant ships of the largest size can come up to the wharves. Steam-boats pass between Providence and New York, through Long Island Sound, during all the open season, and nearly the whole of the summer travelling from Boston to the S. passes by this route. Providence was founded by Roger Williams in 1636. It retained the denomination and government of a town until 1831, when a city charter was adopted.

Brown University at this place was founded in 1764, and was first established at Warren: it was removed to Providence in 1770. It has been supported solely by individual patronage, and its funds are not large. The college edifices are two brick buildings, containing 100 rooms for students, and others for public purposes. The college is delightfully situated on an eminence in the E. part of the town, which commands a beautiful prospect. The libraries contain 12,000 volumes, including those belonging to literary societies. The officers are a President and 8 Professors. The board of trustees is composed of 36 members, of whom 22 must be Baptists, 5 Quakers, 5 Episcopalians and four Congregationalists. The Fellows, or Learned Faculty, are 12, of whom 8, including the President, must be Baptists. The number of students in 1831, was 96. There are 3 vacations in May, September and December, amounting to 13 weeks. Commencement is in September.

Prusa, or Prusia. See Bursa.

Prussia, a large country of Europe, occupying a great part of the N. of Germany, and extending with little interruption from the confines of Lithuania to those of the Netherlands. It is a very fertile country, producing a great deal of flax, hemp, and corn. There are a great number of domestic animals: and the sea, the rivers, and lakes, supply abundance of fish. Game abounds; and elks, wild asses, and ur, are found in the forests: these last are of a huge size, and have some resemblance to beeves; their hides are extremely thick and strong, and they are sold to foreigners at a great price. One of the most remarkable productions of this country is yellow amber, which is found along the sea-coast. There are two large lakes, besides the rivers Vistula and Pregel. The inhabitants are generally of a good constitution, laborious, and robust. There are a great number of mechanics; but the principal business is husbandry, with the feeding of cattle. The present monarchy of Prussia consists of two distinct parts separated by the German States, and contains 105,770 sq. m. of territory, and a pop. of 12,552,278. The army amounts to 165,000 men. The revenue is 40,000,000 dollars: the public debt 120,000,000. The government is an absolute monarchy. The religion of the royal family is protestant, but all creeds are tolerated.

In the 13th century Prussia belonged to the knights of the Teutonic order. In 1454, that part since denominated Polish, or W. Prussia, revolted to Casimir IV. king of Poland, and was incorporated into the dominions of the republic. At the same time the knights were constrained to hold the remaining part, called Ducal or E. Prussia, as a fief of the crown of Poland. In 1525 Albert, the grand master, betrayed the interests of his fraternity, and concluded a treaty with Sigismund, king of Poland, by which E. Prussia was erected into an hereditary duchy, and given to him as a Polish fief. Having adopted the tenets of Luther, he married a princess of Denmark, and transmitted this rich inheritance to his descendants: one of whom, Frederic William, was the first duke that threw off his dependence on Poland. The foundation of the Prussian monarchy was established by him, between 1640 and 1688. His son and successor, Frederic, in 1701 assumed the title of King of Prussia, which was soon after acknowledged by all the Christian powers, except Poland, which did not acknowledge it till 1764. In 1742 Frederic II. acquired the duchy of Silesia from the house of Austria; and by his wonderful victories, and the still more wonderful resources by which he repaired occasional defeats, he became the admiration of the age. In 1772 he compelled the Poles to cede to him Western Prussia, excepting the cities of Dantzic and Thorn. He cultivated the arts of peace as well as war, distinguishing himself as a poet, philosopher, and legislator, and expending large sums in the improvement of the country. He was succeeded by his nephew, Frederic William II., in 1786, who forcibly annexed to his kingdom Dantzic and Thorn, with several considerable provinces, which he styled Southern Prussia. He had also a share in the general contest against France, in the early part of the revolution; but made peace with that country in April, 1795; and died at Berlin in 1797.

His son, Frederic William III., continued on amicable terms with France, till the dissolution of the Germanic body in 1806, and the consequent formation of the Confederation of the Rhine, when, thinking himself aggrieved, he declared war against France. This war was of short duration, but of most disastrous consequences to Prussia. By the peace of Tilsit, the whole of the Polish dominions belonging to Prussia, with a few exceptions, were transferred to another prince; and the king of Prussia had further to renounce his right to all the territories, without exception, situated between the Elbe and the Rhine; to those belonging to Saxony and the House of Anhalt on the right bank of the Elbe; and, lastly, to the circle of Rottbus, in Lower Lusatia, which was ceded to Saxony. Thus was Prussia reduced to the lowest rank among the powers of Europe. On the memorable retreat of the French armies from Russia, and the arrival of the Russians within the territories of Prussia, she, however, threw off her alliance with France, joined Russia in the war, and made such extraordinary efforts to retrieve her lost character, by the magnitude of her armies and the courage which she maintained in the field, that on the conclusion of the war all the countries which had been wrested from her by the treaty of Tilsit were restored.

The kingdom is now divided into 10 provinces, namely, E. Prussia, W. Prussia, Brandenburg, Pomerania, Westphalia, Cleves and Berg, Silesia, Posen, Saxony, and Lower Rhine; which are subdivided into 28 governments. For military purposes, the kingdom is divided into five great parts, viz. Prussia, Brandenburg and Pomerania, Silesia and Prussian Poland, Saxony, and finally Westphalia with the Lower Rhine. Berlin is the capital of all Prussia.

Prussia, Proper, an extensive division of the Prussian states, between the northern frontier of Poland and the Baltic. It comprises the provinces of E. and W. Putney, a village in Surrey, Eng. seated on the Thames, over which is a wooden bridge, 4 m. W. S. W. of London. On Putney heath is an obelisk, erected in 1786, in commemoration of Mr. Hartley's invention of fire-plates, for securing buildings from fire; and on its borders are several elegant mansions.

Putney, p.t. Windham Co. Vt. on the Connecticut. 33 m. S. Windsor. Pop. 1,510.

Puttan Somnauth, or Puttan, a town of Hindoostan, near the southern extremity of the Guzerat Peninsula. Somnauth is one of the twelve images of Seeb which are said to have descended from heaven to earth; and the great fame of its temple attracted the cupidity, while it stimulated the bigotry, of Sultan Mahmood, of Ghizni. According to Mahomedan authors, the image was destroyed, but the Hindoos assert that the god retired into the ocean! The symbol placed in the temple is deemed peculiarly propitious to those who desire offspring. It is visited by pilgrims from every quarter, who pay a trifling duty to the Nabob for permission to perform their devotions at this favourite shrine. The Bombay Presidency is stated to have used its influence with the Junaghar State, in 1816, to secure greater freedom of pilgrimage to Puttan. It stands near the sea, 95 m. S. of Noanagur. Long. 69. 40. E., lat. 21. 2. N.

Puy, a city of France, capital of the department of Upper Loire, and a bishop's see. The cathedral is famous for a prodigious quantity of relics; and Our Lady of Puy is celebrated in the annals of superstition. Puy has manufactures of blankets, linen, lace, silk, stuffs, and stoneware. It is seated on the mountain Anis, near the river Loire, 45 m. N. E. of Mendo and 65 S. E. of Clermont. Long. 3. 58. E., lat. 45. 58. N.

Puy de Dome, a department of France, containing part of the former province of Auvergne. It has its name from a mountain, situate to the W. of Clermont, the capital of the department.

Puy en Anjou, a town in the department of Maine-et-Loire, 10 m. S. S. W. of Saumur.

Puy l' Eveque, a town in the department of Lot, 16 m. W. by N. of Cahors.

Puycerda, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, capital of the county of Cerdagna, seated at the foot of the Pyrenees, near the source of the Segra, 47 m. W. by S. of Perpignan and 78 N. by W. of Barcelona. It was taken by the French in 1794. Long. 1. 50. E., lat. 42. 36. N.

Puyzeaux, a town of France, department of Tarn, 28 m. S. by W. of Alby.

Puzzuoli, or Possuoli, a celebrated, but now inconsiderable city of Italy, on the bay of Naples. Here are the remains of the temple of Jupiter Serapis, an interesting monument of antiquity, being different from the Roman and Greek temples, and built in the manner of the Asiatic; probably by the Egyptian and Asiatic merchants settled at Puzznoli, which was the great emporium of Italy, till the Romans built Ostia and Antium. It has been converted into a Christian cathedral, and so much modern work added that at present only the front of the ancient edifice is visible. Many other remains of temples, amphitheatres, and other public buildings in this city, afford convincing proofs of its former magnificence. The ruins of Cicero's villa, near this place, are of such extent as to give a high idea of the wealth of that great orator; 9 m. W. of Naples.

Pyramids, a range of ancient and stupendous Egyptian monuments, extending northwards from Cairo, but on the opposite or west side of the Nile. They are continued almost uninterruptedly for about 20 leagues, upon a plain occupying the lower slope of a ridge of hills, which runs parallel to the Nile. This plain is elevated about 50 feet above the ground inundated by the river and consists of hard rock, forming a proper support for the immense weight of the structures erected upon it. The pyramids are distinguished by their form, which the name expresses, and still more by their great dimensions. The three largest are in the neighbourhood of the town of Gizeh, and are named from their founders. The following are their names and dimensions.

	Feet high.	Ft. sq. at base.
Cheops	499	693
Cephrenes	398	655
Mycerinus	162	260

The pyramids, at first view, present the appearance of solid masses; and it seems to have been the intention of the founders, that the few openings which they contain, should remain perpetually closed. The ingenuity of successive ages has traced the openings of the great pyramid, which were so studiously concealed. The exterior opening is 60 feet above the base, and leads into a passage 66 paces long. Beyond are successive galleries, one 120 feet, another 170, and another 180 feet long. The principal chamber, at the end of the longest gallery, is 36 feet long, 16 broad, and 18 high. At the farthest extremity is the sarcophagus, for the reception of which this enormous structure is supposed to have been reared. This pyramid is ascended on the outside by an uninterrupted flight of steps, from 21-2 to 4 feet, diminished in height, as they approach the top. The breadth is so proportioned to the height that a line stretched from the top to the bottom would touch the angle of every step. The external part is built of square stones, cut in the rock found along the Nile. They are compacted together solely by their own weight, without lime, lead, or cramps of any metal. In the body of the pyramid, however, which is full of irregular stones, it has been necessary to employ a mortar composed of lime, earth, and clay. The pyramid of Cephrenes was first opened by M. Belzoni, in 1818. The sarcophagus was found to contain bones, supposed to be human, which appeared to confirm the belief, that these stupendous monuments, as has been asserted by Strabo and Diodorus, were intended as sepulchres of the kings of Egypt. But a thigh bone, which was carried to London, and examined by the royal college of Physicians, was pronounced to belong to a cow, whence it has been inferred that these structures were reared in honour of this favourite object of Egyptian worship.

Pyrbaum, a town of Bavaria, capital of a lordship of its name, situate on the frontier of Franconia, 13 m. S. E. of Nuremberg.

Pyrenees, a range of mountains which divide France from Spain, and the most celebrated in Europe, except the Alps. They reach from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic, about 212 m. in length, and have different names, according to their different situations. The passages over them are not so difficult as those of the Alps: one of the most frequented is that from Pampeluna to St. Jean de Pied de Port, by which the French under Soult marched to attack the British before Pampeluna, in July 1813. These mountains contain iron, copper, lead, silver, gold, cobalt, and zinc; they also furnish great quantities of timber for ship-building, and abundance of pitch and tar. See Perdu, Mount.

Pyrenees, Eastern, a department of France, containing the provinces of Ronsillon, Cerdagne, and part of Languedoc. Its area is estimated at 1,650 sq. m., and the pop. at 126,500. Although great part of the country is mountainous, yet it is fertile in corn, excellent wine, olives, oranges, &c. Perpignan is the capital.

Pyrenees, Lower, a department of France, comprehending the province of Bearn and Navarre. The principal products are corn, wine, flax, chest nuts, and other fruits; the manufactures woolen, linen, leather, and recently cotton. The province contains an area of about 3,000 sq. m., with 380,000 inhabitants. Pau is the capital.

Pyrenees, Upper, a department of France, including the province of Bigorre, and comprising an area of 1,800 sq. m. with 200,000 inhabitants. Here are excellent horses and good partridges. The valleys are very fertile, furnishing rye, millet, Spanish corn, and flax. The mountains have mines of lead, iron, and copper, and quarries of slate, marble, and jasper. Tarbes is the capital.

Pyrmont, a town of the N. W. part of Germany, capital of a small district of the same name, belonging to the prince of Waldeck. Near it are mineral waters, well known to all Europe, and frequented by persons of the highest rank. It is seated in a delightful valley, between high mountains, 38 m. S. W. of Hanover. Long. 9 20. E., lat. 51. 57. N.

Pyrslein, a town of Bavaria, in the principality of Passau, insulated in Austria. It is 10 m. N. W. of Lintz and 22 E. of Passau.

QUACHA, a lake of Louisiana between the Mississippi and Barataria Bay.

Quackenbuck, a town of Hanover, in the principality of Osnaburg; seated on the Hase. 23 m. N. of Osnaburg.

Quadra and Vancouver's Island, an island on the N. W. coast of America, on the S. W. coast of which is Nootka Sound. It was so named by captain Vancouver in compliment to senior Quadra, the Spanish commandment at Nootka. It is about 300 m. in length, and 89 in its greatest breadth.

Quaker Hill, p.v. Dutchess Co. N. Y. 20 m. E. Fishkill.

Quaker Springs, p.v. Saratoga Co. N. Y. 31 m. N. Albany.

Quang-ping, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Fe-tche-li, 212 m. S. S. E. of Peking. Long. 114. 30. E., lat. 36. 47. N.

Quang-si, an inland province in the S. of China. It produces plenty of rice, being watered by several large rivers. The southern part is a flat country, and well cultivated; but the northern is full of mountains, covered with trees. It contains mines of all sorts, and particularly a gold mine. Here is a tree called quang-lang, the pith of which is made into bread; and a small species of insect which produces white wax. Quelling is the capital.

Quang-tong, a province of China, bounded on the E. by Kiang-si and Fo-kien, on the S. by the ocean, and on the W. by Tonquin. It is diversified by valleys and mountains, and yields two crops of corn in a year. The northern frontier consists of a range of lofty mountains, which abound in gold, jewels, tin, quick-silver, copper, and iron. Ebony and several sorts of odoriferous wood are produced in this province, as well as various sorts of fruit. There is a species of lemon as large as a man's head; and another sort which grows out at the trunk of the tree, whose rind is very hard, and contains a great number of little cells, full of an excellent yellow pulp. A prodigious number of ducks are bred in this province, their eggs being hatched in ovens. The mountains are covered with a kind of osiers, which creep along the ground, and are so tough that they make baskets, hurdles, mats, and even ropes of them. Here is also a tree the timber of which is remarkably hard and heavy, and is thence called ironwood. Canton is the capital, but the viceroy resides at Chao-king.

Quangtung, a town on the N. borders of Birman, in the province of Ava, with a fort, seated on the Irrawaddy, 150 m. N. N. E. of Ummereapoora.

Queaux, a town of France, department of Vienne, 21 m. S. E. of Poitiers.

Quebec, the capital of Canada, and of British America, is situated at the confluence of the rivers St. Lawrence and St. Charles (or the Little River), about 320 miles from the sea. It is built on a rock, which is partly of marble and partly of slate, and is divided into Upper and Lower. Near it is a fine lead mine. At the time it was founded, in 1608, the tide, it is said, reached the foot of the rock; but since that period this river has sunk so far that a large spot of ground is left dry, and on this an extensive suburb is built, styled the Lower Town, which stands at the foot of a rocky precipice, about 48 feet in height, and is chiefly inhabited by merchants. The houses in both towns are of stone, strong, and well built. The fortifications are extensive, but irregular. The natural situation of the town renders its defence easy. If attacked by ships from the river, their guns cannot injure the works of the Upper Town, though the ships themselves would be liable to great injury from the cannon and bombs from these elevated ramparts. The Lower Town is defended by a platform, flanked with two bastions, which, at high water and spring tides, are almost level with the surface of the water. A little above the bastion, to the right, is a half bastion, out out of the rock; a little higher a large battery, and higher still a square fort, the most regular of all the fortifications, and in which the governor resides. The passages which form a communication between these rocks are extremely rugged. The rock which separates the Upper from the Lower Town extends, with a bold and steep front, a considerable distance W. along the river St. Lawrence. The Lower Town is well supplied with water, which is sometimes scarce in the Upper Town. This city was erected by the French in 1608; the English reduced it, with all Canada, in 1629, but it was restored in 1632. In 1711 it was besieged by the English without success; in 1759 it was again conquered, after a battle memorable for the death of general Wolfe in the moment of victory, and was confirmed to them by the peace of 1763. In 1775 it was attacked by the Americans under general Montgomery, who was slain, and his army repulsed. Of late years great improvements have been effected, and the present population amounts to nearly 22,000. The chief exports are grain, flour, timber, lumber, &c. The basin of Quebec is capable of containing 100 sail of the line. 180 m. N. E. Montreal. 330 m. N. of Boston. Long. 70. 45. W., lat. 46. 55. N.

Queida, a kingdom of Asia, in the peninsula of Malacca. The king is tributary to Siam. The principal town is of the same name, has a harbour, and is 300 m. N. of the city of Malacca. Long. 100. 5. E., lat. 7. 5. N.

Quedlinberg, a town of Prussian Saxony, in the principality of Anhalt, with a castle. The river Bode divides it into the Old and New Town. It has a trade in brandy and linen, and is 10 m. S. by E. of Halberstadt. Long. 11. 10. E., lat. 51. 50. N.

Queen Ann, a county of Maryland, on the E. of Chesapeake Bay. Pop. 14,396. Centerville is the chief town.

Queen Ann, a town of Maryland, in Prince George county, situate at the foot of a hill, on the Patuxent, 13 m. S. W. of Annapolis and 22 E. of Washington.

Queen Charlotte Island, an island in the S. Pacific, 6 m. long and 1 broad, discovered by captain Wallis in 1767. Long. 138. 4. W., lat. 19. 18. S.

Queen Charlotte Islands, a group of islands in the N. Pacific, explored by captain Carteret in 1767. The most considerable he named Egmont, but the Spaniards call it Santa Cruz. It is 60 m. long and from 20 to 30 broad, woody and mountainous, with many valleys intermixed. The inhabitants are very nimble, vigorous, and active; and their weapons are bows and arrows pointed with flint. On the N. side is a harbour named Swallow Bay. Long. 164. 26. E., lat. 10. 42. S.

Queen Charlotte Sound, a sound at the N. extremity of the S. island of New Zealand, near Cook Strait. Long. 174. 14. E., lat. 41. 6. S.

Queensborough, a borough in Kent, Eng. in the Isle of Sheppey. It had once a strong castle, remains of which are still to be seen. The chief employment of the inhabitants is fishing, and oysters are here in great plenty. The town is seated near the mouth of the Medway, 15 m. N. W. of Canterbury and 45 E. by S. of London. Long. 0. 49. E., lat. 51. 23. N.

Queensborough, a town of S. Carolina, on the W. side of the Great Pedee River, 32 m. N. N. W. of Georgetown.

Queensborough, a village in Tuscarawas Co. Ohio.

Queen's County, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, about 30 m. long and 29 broad; bounded on the N. by King's county, E. by Kildare, S. E. by Carlow, S. by Kilkenny, and W. by Tipperary and King's county. It is divided into nine baronies and 50 parishes, contains about 134,000 inhabitants, and sends three members to parliament. It was formerly full of woods and bogs, but is now much improved in cultivation. Maryborough is the capital.

Queens County, a county of New York, in the W. part of Long Island. Pop. 22,276. N. Hempstead is the chief town.

Queensferry, a borough of Scotland, in Linlithgowshire, seated on the frith of Forth, where it is not more than 2 m. wide. It has a trade in soap, and a much frequented ferry. It is 9 m. W. of Edinburgh.

Queenstadt, a town of Prussian Saxony, 5 m. N. E. of Halberstadt.

Queens town, a town of Upper Canada, on the river Niagara, 7 miles below the falls. Here all the merchandise and stores received from Kingston for the upper part of the province are sent in waggons to Chippewa, a distance of 10 m. the falls and broken course of the river rendering the navigation impracticable for that space. It is 7 m. above Fort Niagara and 20 N. by E. of Fort Erie.

Queens town, p.v. Queen Ann's Co. Maryland. 33 m. S. E. Baltimore.

Queich, a river of Bavaria, which passes by Anweiler and Landau, and enters the Rhine near Germersheim.

Quei-ling, a city of China, capital of the province of Quang-si. It has its name from a flower called quei, which grows on a tree resembling a laurel, and emits such a sweet odor that it perfumes the whole country. It stands on a river that runs into the Ta, but with such rapidity as not to be navigable. It is 180 m. N. by W. of Canton and 567 S. of Peking. Long. 109. 51. E., lat. 25. 12. N.

Queamahoning, a township of Somerset Co. Pa.

Quentin, St., a strong town of France, department of Aisne, with a considerable manufacture of lawns and cambrics; also gauze, linen, and thread. Near this place, in 1557, Philip II. of Spain gained a signal victory over the French, and afterwards took the town by storm, but it was restored to France in 1559. It is seated on an eminence, on the river Somme, 21 m. S. of Cambrai and 83 N. by E. of Paris. Long. 3. 20. E., lat. 49. 50. N.

Quercy, a province of France, now forming the department of Lot.

Queretaro, a city of Mexico, capital of a province of the same name. Pop. 35,000. 96 m. N. W. Mexico.

Querimba, a cluster of small islands on the coast of Mozambique, fertile in fruits and pastures. The principal one, of the same name, is in long. 41. 30. E., lat. 11. 40. S.

Quennoy, a fortified town of France, department of Nord, with an old castle. In 1793 it was taken by the Austrians, but retaken the next year. It is seated in an extensive plain, on the rivulet Ronelle, 9 m. S. E. of Valenciennes and 122 N. E. of Paris. Long. 3. 40. E., lat. 50. 15. N.

Quiberon, a town in the department of Morbihan with a fort, situate at the extremity of a peninsula, to the N. of Belleisle. In 1795 it was taken by some French royalists in the pay of Great Britain; but, owing to the desertion and treachery of some of the soldiers, the republicans soon took it by surprise. It was taken by the English in 1800, but evacuated soon afterwards. 17 m. S. S. E. of Port Louis.

Quicaro, an island in the Pacific Ocean, near the coast of Veragua, about 20 m. long and 6 broad. Long. 82. 39. W., lat. 7. 50. N.

Quilimancy, a sea-port of Zanguebar, in the kingdom of Melinda. It stands at the mouth of a river of the same name, 26 m. S. S. W. of Melinda. Long. 41. 40. E., lat. 3. 10. S.

Quillan, a town of France, department of Aude, 25 m. S. S. W. of Carcassonne.

Quillebeuf, a town of France in the department of Eure, seated on the Seine, 37 m. W. of Rouen. and 42 N. W. of Evreux.

Quiloa, a sea-port of Zanguebar, capital of a kingdom of the same name, with a small citadel. This country was for some time in the possession of the Portuguese, from whom it was wrested by the imam of Mascat. It produces abundance of rice, millet, fruits, cattle, and poultry. The inhabitants are Mahomedans partly black and partly tawny. The capital is well built, and stands on an island, at the mouth of the river Coava. Long. 40. 0. E., lat. 8. 38. S.

Quimper, a city of France, capital of the department of Finisterre, and a bishop's see. It is seated at the conflux of the Oder and Benaudet, 34. m. S. S. E. of Brest and 112 W. by S. of Rennes. Long. 4. 6. W., lat. 47. 58. N.

Quimperle, a town of France in the department of Finisterre, seated on the Isolle, 30 m. E. S. E. of Quimper.

Quincy, p.t. Norfolk Co. Mass. 9 m. S. E. Boston. Pop. 2,192. Here is a quarry of excellent granite much used for building in Boston and the neighborhood. The Quincy Railroad extends from this place to Neponset river. It is 3 m. in length with a single track. It was constructed in 1836, and was the first undertaking of the kind in America. On an elevated rock at the commencement of the railroad, stands a square tower of stone with an inscription commemorating the foundation of the work. The view from the summit of the tower is exceedingly fine, embracing Boston Bay, its islands, and a wide extent of country.

Quincy, p.v. Morgan Co. and Adams Co. Illinois.

Quingey, a town of France, in the department of Doubs, seated on the Louve, 12 m. S. W. of Besancon.

Quin-nog, or Chin-chi, a bay on the coast of Cochinchina, much frequented by the vessels of the country, being an excellent harbour. The entrance is narrow, and ships of burden can get in only at high water. At the head of the harbour is the city of Quin-nong. Long. 109. 15. E., lat. 13. 52. N.

Quinson, a town of France, department of Lower Alps, 29 m. S. of Digne.

Quatin, a town in the department of Cotes du Nord, seated in a valley, on the Goy, 10 m. S. S. W. of St. Brieuc.

Quinzias, a chain of mountains in the kingdom of Fez, 100 m. in length, extending from the desert of Gret to the river Nocer.

Quirpon, an island in the Atlantic, near the N. coast of Newfoundland. Long. 53. 22. W., lat. 51. 40. N.

Quistello, a town of Austrian Italy, famous for an action between the French and Austrians in 1734, when marshal Broglie was surprised in his bed. It is seated on the Seccia, 15 m. S. of Mantua.

Quito, a presidency of the republic of Colombia, lying between two chains of the high mountains called the Andes. The eastern governments are chiefly immense tracts, thinly scattered with missionary villages. The vegetable productions vary with the elevation of the ground. The champaign country produces abundant crops of maize; and the deep ravines, where the temperature is hot, produce sugar-cane. The elevated lands possess a colder climate, and produce wheat, barley, &c. Immense flocks of sheep are reared in the mountain plains, and their wool furnishes materials for the manufactures of this province. The lands are generally well cultivated, and there are a great number of towns and villages inhabited almost entirely by Indians. The streets are generally straight and in the direction of the four cardinal points; and the roads are laid out in a line, crossing each other, so that the aspect of the country is that of a large garden. Although this country is situate on both sides the equator, yet it lies so high, and so near the snow-clad mountains, that the air is very temperate. There are no noxious animals; for the tigers and serpents are below in the forests. The state of society in this province has undergone considerable improvement since its deliverance from Spanish domination, and the manufactures are in a flourishing state. Hats, cotton stuffs, and coarse woollen cloths, are made here in great quantities, and exported to other parts of S. America.

Quito, the capital of the above country, is seated on the skirts of the volcanic mountain of Pinchincha, in a pleasant valley, but on high ground, 9,510 feet above the level of the sea. Having no mines in its neighbourhood, it is chiefly famous for manufactures of cotton, wool, and flax. The town is plentifully supplied with water, and enjoys a delightful climate; but it is subject, together with the whole country, to the awful calamity of earthquakes. Of these a very destructive one was experienced in 1755. In 1797 the face of the whole district was changed by a most dreadful concussion, and 40,000 persons were in one moment hurled into eternity. Violent shocks of earthquakes have since been frequently experienced. It is notwithstanding very populous, and inhabited by several families of distinguished rank. 400 m. S. W. of Bogota. Long. 77. 55. W., lat. 0. 13. S.

Quizama, a province of Africa in the S. part of Angola. It is mountainous and badly cultivated, but produces abundance of honey, wax, and salt. The inhabitants are warlike, and have never submitted to the Portuguese.

Quoja, an inland country of Africa, lying E. of Sierra Leone. It is well cultivated, but has little commercial intercourse.

Quovado, a town of Austrian Illyria, in Istria Quorra, See Niger.

R

RAAB, a town and fortress of Hungary, capital of a county of its name, and a bishop's see. It is a strong frontier bulwark against the Turks, and is seated at the conflux of the Raab and Rabinitz, not far from the Danube, 38 m. S. S. E. of Presburg. Long. 17. 7. E., lat. 47. 38. N.

Raajegur, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Malwa, 74 m. N. E. of Ougein and 214 S. S. W. of Agra. Long. 76. 56. E., lat. 24. 2. N.

Rassa, one of the Hebrides of Scotland, between the mainland of Ross-shire and the Isle of Skye. It is annexed to the parish of Portree, in the county of Inverness, and is about 12 m. long and 4 broad, rising with a gentle ascent from the W. side to a great height on the E. side, which is nearly perpendicular. It is famous for its millstone quarries, and at the N. E. end stands Castle Broichin, which is a noted sea-mark. Long. 6. 0. W., lat. 57. 32. N.
